

HENRY FROWDE, M.A.
PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

LONDON, EDINBURGH, AND NEW YORK

ESSAYS OF
JOHN DRYDEN

SELECTED AND EDITED

BY

W. P. KER, M.A.

FELLOW OF ALL SOULS COLLEGE; HON. LL.D. GLASGOW PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH LITERATURE IN UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON

VOLUME II

Oxford

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

1900

Oxford

PRINTED AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

BY HORACE HART, M.A.

PRINTER TO THE UNIVERSITY

CONTENTS

	PAGE
DEDICATION OF EXAMEN POETICUM (1693)	I
A DISCOURSE CONCERNING THE ORIGINAL AND PROGRESS OF SATIRE (1693)	15
A PARALLEL OF POETRY AND PAINTING (1695)	115
DEDICATION OF THE ÆNEIS (1697)	154
TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL: POSTSCRIPT (1697)	240
PREFACE TO THE FABLES (1700)	246
NOTES TO THE SECOND VOLUME	275
APPENDIX A (A SHORT HISTORY OF CRITICISM, BY THE TRANSLATOR OF ST. EVREMOND (1685)	313
APPENDIX B (AUTHORITIES, CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL)	315
INDEX	317

EXAMEN POETICUM:

BEING THE THIRD PART OF MISCELLANY POEMS

[1693]

DEDICATION

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE MY LORD RADCLIFFE

MY LORD,

THESE Miscellany Poems are by many titles yours. The first they claim, from your acceptance of my promise to present them to you, before some of them were yet in being. The rest are derived from your own merit, the exactness of your judgment in Poetry, and the candour of your nature, easy to forgive some trivial faults, when they come accompanied with countervailing beauties. But, after all, though these are your equitable claims to a dedication from other poets, yet I must acknowledge a bribe in the case, which is your particular liking of my verses. 'Tis a vanity common to all writers, to overvalue their own productions; and 'tis better for me to own this failing in myself, than the world to do it for me. For what other reason have I spent my life in so unprofitable a study? why am I grown old, in seeking so barren a reward as fame?

The same parts and application which have made me a poet might have raised me to any honours of the gown, which are often given to men of as little learning and less honesty than myself. No Government has 5 ever been, or ever can be, wherein timeservers and blockheads will not be uppermost. The persons are only changed, but the same jugglings in State, the same hypocrisy in religion, the same self-interest and mismanagement, will remain for ever. Blood and money
10 will be lavished in all ages, only for the preferment of new faces, with old consciences. There is too often a jaundice in the eyes of great mēn; they see not those whom they raise in the same colours with other men. All whom they affect look golden to them, when the 15 gilding is only in their own distempered sight. These considerations have given me a kind of contempt for those who have risen by unworthy ways. I am not ashamed to be little, when I see them so infamously great; neither do I know why the name of poet should 20 be dishonourable to me, if I am truly one, as I hope I am; for I will never do any thing that shall dishonour it. The notions of morality are known to all men; none can pretend ignorance of those ideas which are inborn in mankind; and if I see one thing, and practise
25 the contrary, I must be disingenuous not to acknowledge a clear truth, and base to act against the light of my own conscience. For the reputation of my honesty, no man can question it, who has any of his own; for that of my poetry, it shall either stand by its own 30 merit, or fall for want of it. Ill writers are usually the sharpest censors; for they, as the best poet and the best patron said,

When in the full perfection of decay,
Turn vinegar, and come again in play.

35 Thus the corruption of a poet is the generation of a critic; I mean of a critic in the general acceptation of this age; for formerly they were quite another species of men. They were defenders of poets, and commentators on their works; to illustrate obscure beauties; to place some passages in a better light; to redeem others from malicious interpretations; to help out an author's modesty, who is not ostentatious of his wit; and, in short, to shield him from the ill-nature of those fellows, who were then called Zoili and Momi, and now take upon themselves the venerable name of censors. 10 But neither Zoilus, nor he who endeavoured to defame Virgil, were ever adopted into the name of critics by the Ancients; what their reputation was then, we know; and their successors in this age deserve no better. Are our auxiliary forces turned our enemies? are they, 15 who at best are but wits of the second order, and whose only credit amongst readers is what they obtained by being subservient to the fame of writers, are these become rebels, of slaves, and usurpers, of subjects? or, to speak in the most honourable terms 20 of them, are they from our seconds become principals against us? Does the ivy undermine the oak which supports its weakness? What labour would it cost them to put in a better line, than the worst of those which they expunge in a true poet? Petronius, the 25 greatest wit perhaps of all the Romans, yet when his envy prevailed upon his judgment to fall on Lucan, he fell himself in his attempt; he performed worse in his Essay of the Civil War than the author of the Pharsalia; and, avoiding his errors, has made greater of his own. 30 Julius Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicate him after the possession of three thousand years: has he succeeded in his attempt? He has indeed shown us some of those imperfections in him, which are incident to humankind; but who had not rather be that 35

Homer than this Scaliger? You see the same hyper-critic, when he endeavours to mend the beginning of Claudian, (a faulty poet, and living in a barbarous age,) yet how short he comes of him, and substitutes such 5 verses of his own as deserve the ferula. What a censure has he made of Lucan, that "he rather seems to bark than sing"! Would any but a dog have made so snarling a comparison? one would have thought he had learned Latin as late as they tell us he did Greek.
 10 Yet he came off, with a pace tuâ, "by your good leave, Lucan"; he called him not by those outrageous names, of fool, booby, and blockhead: he had somewhat more of good manners than his successors, as he had much more knowledge. We have two sorts of those gentle-15 men in our nation; some of them, proceeding with a seeming moderation and pretence of respect to the dramatic writers of the last age, only scorn and vilify the present poets, to set up their predecessors. But this is only in appearance; for their real design is 20 nothing less than to do honour to any man, besides themselves. Horace took notice of such men in his age—

Non ingeniis favet ille sepultis, Nostra sed impugnat; nos nostraque lividus odit.

25 'Tis not with an ultimate intention to pay reverence to the Manes of Shakespeare, Fletcher, and Ben Johnson, that they commend their writings, but to throw dirt on the writers of this age: their declaration is one thing, and their practice is another. By 30 a seeming veneration to our fathers, they would thrust out us, their lawful issue, and govern us themselves, under a specious pretence of reformation. If they could compass their intent, what would wit and learning get by such a change? If we are bad poets, they 35 are worse; and when any of their woful pieces come abroad, the difference is so great betwixt them and good writers, that there need no criticisms on our part to decide it. When they describe the writers of this age, they draw such monstrous figures of them, as resemble none of us; our pretended pictures are so unlike, that 'tis evident we never sat to them: they are all grotesque; the products of their wild imaginations, things out of nature; so far from being copied from us, that they resemble nothing that ever was, or ever can be. But there is another sort of insects, more venomous than the former; those who manifestly aim at the destruction of our poetical church and state; who allow nothing to their countrymen, either of this or of the former age. These attack the living by raking up the ashes of the dead; well knowing that if they can subvert their original title to the stage, we who claim under them must fall of course. Peace be to the venerable shades of Shakespeare and Ben Johnson! none of the living will presume to have any competition with them; as they were our predecessors, so they were our masters. We trail our plays under them; but as at the funerals of a Turkish emperor, our ensigns are furled or dragged upon the ground, in honour to the dead, so we may lawfully advance our own afterwards, to show that we succeed; if less in dignity, yet on the same foot and title, which we think too we can maintain against the insolence of our own Janizaries. If I am the man, as I have reason to believe, who am seemingly courted, and secretly undermined; I think I shall be able to defend myself, when I am openly attacked; and to show, besides, that the Greek writers only gave us the rudiments of a stage which they never finished; that many of the tragedies in the former age amongst us were without comparison beyond those of Sophocles and Euripides. But at present I have neither the leisure, nor the means, for such an undertaking. 'Tis ill going to law for an estate, with him who is in possession of it, and enjoys the present profits, to feed his cause. But the quantum mulatus may be remembered in due time. In the meanwhile, I leave the world to judge, who gave the provocation.

This, my Lord, is, I confess, a long digression, from Miscellany Poems to Modern Tragedies; but I have the ordinary excuse of an injured man, who will be telling his tale unseasonably to his betters; though, at the same time, I am certain you are so good a friend, as to take a concern in all things which belong to one who so truly honours you. And besides, being yourself a critic of the genuine sort, who have read the best authors in their own languages, who perfectly distinguish of their several merits, and in general prefer them to the Moderns, yet, I know, you judge for the English tragedies, against Greek and Latin, as well as against the French, Italian, and Spanish, of these latter ages. Indéed, there is a vast difference betwixt arguing like Perrault, in behalf of the French poets, against Homer and Virgil, and betwixt giving the English poets their undoubted due, of excelling Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. For if we, or our greater fathers, have not yet brought the drama to an absolute perfection, yet at least we have carried it much further than those ancient Greeks; who, beginning from a Chorus, could never totally exclude it, as we have done; who find it an unprofitable encumbrance, without any necessity of entertaining it amongst us, and without the possibility of establishing it here, unless it were supported by a public charge. Neither can we accept of those Lay-Bishops, as some call them, who, under pretence of reforming the stage, would intrude themselves upon us, as our superiors; being indeed incompetent judges of what is manners, what religion, and, least of all, what is poetry and good sense. I can tell them, in behalf of all my fellows, that when they come to exercise a jurisdiction over us, they shall have the stage to themselves, as they have the laurel. As little can I grant, that the 5 French dramatic writers excel the English. Our authors as far surpass them in genius, as our soldiers excel theirs in courage. 'Tis true, in conduct they surpass us either way; yet that proceeds not so much from their greater knowledge, as from the difference of 10 tastes in the two nations. They content themselves with a thin design, without episodes, and managed by few persons. Our audience will not be pleased, but with variety of accidents, an underplot, and many actors. They follow the ancients too servilely in the 15 mechanic rules, and we assume too much licence to ourselves, in keeping them only in view at too great a distance. But if our audience had their tastes, our poets could more easily comply with them, than the French writers could come up to the sublimity of our 20 thoughts, or to the difficult variety of our designs. However it be, I dare establish it for a rule of practice on the stage, that we are bound to please those whom we pretend to entertain; and that at any price, religion and good manners only excepted. And I care not 25 much if I give this handle to our bad illiterate poetasters, for the defence of their scriptions, as they call them. There is a sort of merit in delighting the spectators, which is a name more proper for them, than that of auditors; or else Horace is in the wrong, when 30 he commends Lucilius for it. But these common-places I mean to treat at greater leisure; in the meantime submitting that little I have said to your Lordship's approbation, or your censure, and choosing rather to entertain you this way, as you are a judge of writing, 35 than to oppress your modesty with other commendations; which, though they are your due, yet would not be equally received in this satirical and censorious age. That which cannot, without injury, be denied to 5 you, is the easiness of your conversation, far from affectation or pride; not denying even to enemies their just praises. And this, if I would dwell on any theme of this nature, is no vulgar commendation to your Lordship. Without flattery, my Lord, you have it in 10 your nature to be a patron and encourager of good poets; but your fortune has not yet put into your hands the opportunity of expressing it. What you will be hereafter, may be more than guessed by what you are at present. You maintain the character of 15 a nobleman, without that haughtiness which generally attends too many of the nobility; and when you converse with gentlemen, you forget not that you have been of their order. You are married to the daughter of a King, who, amongst her other high perfections, 20 has derived from him a charming behaviour, a winning goodness, and a majestic person. The Muses and the Graces are the ornaments of your family; while the Muse sings, the Grace accompanies her voice: even the servants of the Muses have sometimes had the happiness 25 to hear her, and to receive their inspirations from her.

I will not give myself the liberty of going further; for 'tis so sweet to wander in a pleasing way, that I should never arrive at my journey's end. To keep myself from being belated in my letter, and tiring 30 your attention, I must return to the place where I was setting out. I humbly dedicate to your Lordship my own labours in this Miscellany; at the same time not arrogating to myself the privilege, of inscribing to you the works of others who are joined with me in this 35 undertaking, over which I can pretend no right. Your

Lady and you have done me the favour to hear me read my translations of Ovid; and you both seemed not to be displeased with them. Whether it be the partiality of an old man to his youngest child, I know not; but they appear to me the best of all my endeavours 5 in this kind. Perhaps this poet is more easy to be translated than some others whom I have lately attempted; perhaps, too, he was more according to my genius. He is certainly more palatable to the reader, than any of the Roman wits; though some of them are 10 more lofty, some more instructive, and others more correct. He had learning enough to make him equal to the best; but, as his verse came easily, he wanted the toil of application to amend it. He is often luxuriant both in his fancy and expressions, and, as it has lately 15 been observed, not always natural. If wit be pleasantry, he has it to excess; but if it be propriety, Lucretius, Horace, and, above all, Virgil, are his superiors. I have said so much of him already in my Preface to his Heroical Epistles, that there remains little to be 20 added in this place. For my own part, I have endeavoured to copy his character, what I could, in this translation; even, perhaps, further than I should have done; to his very faults. Mr. Chapman, in his Translation of Homer, professes to have done it somewhat 25 paraphrastically, and that on set purpose; his opinion being that a good poet is to be translated in that manner. I remember not the reason which he gives for it; but I suppose it is for fear of omitting any of his excellencies. Sure I am, that if it be a fault, 'tis 30 much more pardonable than that of those, who run into the other extreme of a literal and close translation, where the poet is confined so straitly to his author's words, that he wants elbow-room to express his elegancies. He leaves him obscure; he leaves him prose, 35 where he found him verse; and no better than thus has Ovid been served by the so-much-admired Sandys. This is at least the idea which I have remaining of his translation; for I never read him since I was a boy.

5 They who take him upon content, from the praises which their fathers gave him, may inform their judgment by reading him again, and see (if they understand the original) what is become of Ovid's poetry in his version; whether it be not all, or the greatest part of 10 it, evaporated. But this proceeded from the wrong judgment of the age in which he lived. They neither knew good verse, nor loved it; they were scholars, 'tis true, but they were pedants; and for a just reward of their pedantic pains, all their translations want to be 15 translated into English.

If I flatter not myself, or if my friends have not flattered me, I have given my author's sense for the most part truly; for, to mistake sometimes is incident to all men; and not to follow the Dutch commentators 20 always, may be forgiven to a man who thinks them, in the general, heavy gross-witted fellows, fit only to gloss on their own dull poets. But I leave a further satire on their wit, till I have a better opportunity to show how much I love and honour them. I have likewise
25 attempted to restore Ovid to his native sweetness, easiness, and smoothness; and to give my poetry a kind of cadence, and, as we call it, a run of verse, as like the original, as the English can come up to the Latin. As he seldom uses any synalæphas, so I have 30 endeavoured to avoid them as often as I could. I have likewise given him his own turns, both on the words and on the thought; which I cannot say are inimitable, because I have copied them, and so may others, if they use the same diligence; but certainly they are wonder-35 fully graceful in this poet. Since I have named the synalœpha, which is the cutting off one vowel immediately before another, I will give an example of it from Chapman's Homer, which lies before me, for the benefit of those who understand not the Latin prosodia. 'Tis in the first line of the argument to the first Iliad— 5

Apollo's priest to th' Argive fleet doth bring, &c.

There we see he makes it not the Argive, but th' Argive, to shun the shock of the two vowels, immediately following each other. But in his second argument, in the same page, he gives a bad example of the quite 10 contrary kind—

Alpha the pray'r of Chryses sings :

The army's plague, the strife of kings.

In these words, the army's, the ending with a vowel, and army's beginning with another vowel, without 15 cutting off the first, which by it had been th' army's, there remains a most horrible ill-sounding gap betwixt those words. I cannot say that I have everywhere observed the rule of the synalœpha in my translation ; but wheresoever I have not, 'tis a fault in sound. The 20 French and the Italians have made it an inviolable precept in their versification ; therein following the severe example of the Latin poets. Our countrymen have not yet reformed their poetry so far, but content themselves with following the licentious practice of the 25 Greeks ; who, though they sometimes use synalœphas, yet make no difficulty, very often, to sound one vowel upon another ; as Homer does, in the very first line of Alpha—

Μῆνιν ἀειδε, θεά, Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος

30

It is true, indeed, that, in the second line, in these words, μυρί' Ἀχαιοῖς, and ἄλγε' ἔθηκε, the synalœpha, in revenge, is twice observed. But it becomes us, for the sake of euphony, rather Musas colere severiores, with the Romans, than to give into the looseness of the Grecians. 35

I have tired myself, and have been summoned by the press to send away this Dedication; otherwise I had exposed some other faults, which are daily committed by our English poets; which, with care and observation, might be amended. For after all, our language is both copious, significant, and majestic, and might be reduced into a more harmonious sound. But for want of public encouragement, in this Iron Age, we are so far from making any progress in the improvement 10 of our tongue, that in few years we shall speak and write as barbarously as our neighbours.

Notwithstanding my haste, I cannot forbear to tell your Lordship, that there are two fragments of Homer translated in this Miscellany; one by Mr. Congreve, 15 (whom I cannot mention without the honour which is due to his excellent parts, and that entire affection which I bear him,) and the other by myself. Both the subjects are pathetic; and I am sure my friend has added to the tenderness which he found in the original,
20 and without flattery, surpassed his author. Yet I must needs say this in reference to Homer, that he is much more capable of exciting the manly passions than those of grief and pity. To cause admiration is, indeed, the proper and adequate design of an Epic Poem; and in 25 that he has excelled even Virgil. Yet, without presuming to arraign our master, I may venture to affirm, that he is somewhat too talkative, and more than somewhat too digressive. This is so manifest, that it cannot be denied in that little parcel which I have translated,
30 perhaps too literally: there Andromache, in the midst of her concernment and fright for Hector, runs off her bias, to tell him a story of her pedigree, and of the lamentable death of her father, her mother, and her seven brothers. The devil was in Hector if he knew 35 not all this matter, as well as she who told it him; for she had been his bedfellow for many years together : and if he knew it, then it must be confessed, that Homer, in this long digression, has rather given us his own character, than that of the fair lady whom he paints. His dear friends the commentators, who never fail him at a pinch, will needs excuse him, by making the present sorrow of Andromache to occasion the remembrance of all the past ; but others think, that she had enough to do with that grief which now oppressed her, without running for assistance to her family. Virgil, I am confident, would have omitted such a work of supererogation. But Virgil had the gift of expressing much in little, and sometimes in silence ; for, though he yielded much to Homer in invention, he more excelled him in his admirable judgment. He drew the passion of Dido for Æneas, in the most lively and most natural colours that are imaginable. Homer was ambitious enough of moving pity, for he has attempted twice on the same subject of Hector's death ; first, when Priam and Hecuba beheld his corpse, which was dragged after the chariot of Achilles ; and then in the lamentation which was made over him, when his body was redeemed by Priam ; and the same persons again bewail his death, with a chorus of others to help the cry. But if this last excite passion in you, as I doubt not but it will, you are more obliged to the translator than the poet ; for Homer, as I observed before, can move rage better than he can pity. He stirs up the irascible appetite, as our philosophers call it ; he provokes to murder, and the destruction of God's images ; he forms and equips those ungodly man-killers, whom we poets, when we flatter them, call heroes ; a race of men who can never enjoy quiet in themselves, till they have taken it from all the world. This is Homer's commendation ; and, such as it is, the lovers of peace, or at least of more moderate heroism, will never envy him. But let Homer and Virgil contend for the prize of honour betwixt themselves; I am satisfied they will never have a third 5 concurrent. I wish Mr. Congreve had the leisure to translate him, and the world the good nature and justice to encourage him in that noble design, of which he is more capable than any man I know. The Earl of Mulgrave and Mr. Waller, two of the best judges of 10 our age, have assured me, that they could never read over the translation of Chapman without incredible pleasure and extreme transport. This admiration of theirs must needs proceed from the author himself; for the translator has thrown him down as low as harsh 15 numbers, improper English, and a monstrous length of verse could carry him. What then would he appear in the harmonious version of one of the best writers, living in a much better age than was the last? I mean for versification, and the art of numbers; for in the 20 drama we have not arrived to the pitch of Shakespeare and Ben Johnson. But here, my Lord, I am forced to break off abruptly, without endeavouring at a complement in the close. This Miscellany is, without dispute, one of the best of the kind which has hitherto been 25 extant in our tongue. At least, as Sir Samuel Tuke has said before me, a modest man may praise what is not his own. My fellows have no need of any protection; but I humbly recommend my part of it, as much as it deserves, to your patronage and acceptance, and 30 all the rest to your forgiveness.

I am,

MY LORD,

Your Lordship's most obedient servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

Republican Letters: Men without 44: Essay on Satire

A DISCOURSE CONCERNING THE ORIGINAL AND PROGRESS OF SATIRE:

DEDICATED TO

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHARLES, EARL OF DORSET AND MIDDLESEX

LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF THEIR MAJESTIES' HOUSEHOLD, KNIGHT

OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER, ETC.

MY LORD,

THE wishes and desires of all good men, which have attended your Lordship from your first appearance in the world, are at length accomplished, in your obtaining those honours and dignities which you have so long 5 deserved. There are no factions, though irreconcilable to one another, that are not united in their affection to you, and the respect they pay you. They are equally pleased in your prosperity, and would be equally concerned in your afflictions. Titus Vespasian was not 10 more the delight of human-kind. The universal Empire made him only more known, and more powerful, but could not make him more beloved. He had greater ability of doing good, but your inclination to it is not less; and though you could not extend your beneficence 15 to so many persons, yet you have lost as few days as that excellent Emperor; and never had his complaint to make when you went to bed, that the sun had shone upon you in vain, when you had the opportunity of relieving some unhappy man. This, my Lord, has justly acquired you as many friends as there are persons 5 who have the honour to be known to you. Mere acquaintance you have none; you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have conversed with you are for ever after inviolably yours. This is a truth so generally acknowledged, that it needs no proof: 'tis

10 of the nature of a first principle, which is received as soon as it is proposed; and needs not the reformation which Descartes used to his; for we doubt not, neither can we properly say, we think we admire and love you above all other men; there is a certainty in the proposi-
15 tion, and we know it. With the same assurance I can say, you neither have enemies, nor can scarce have any; for they who have never heard of you, can neither love or hate you; and they who have, can have no other notion of you, than that which they receive from the 20 public, that you are the best of men. After this, my testimony can be of no further use, than to declare it to be daylight at high-noon; and all who have the benefit of sight, can look up as well, and see the sun.

'Tis true, I have one privilege which is almost par-25 ticular to myself, that I saw you in the east at your first arising above the hemisphere: I was as soon sensible as any man of that light, when it was but just shooting out, and beginning to travel upwards to the meridian. I made my early addresses to your Lordship, in my 30 Essay of Dramatic Poetry; and therein bespoke you to the world, wherein I have the right of a first discoverer. When I was myself in the rudiments of my poetry, without name or reputation in the world, having rather the ambition of a writer, than the skill; when master to instruct me in it ; an art which had been better praised than studied here in England, wherein Shakespeare, who created the stage among us, had rather written happily, than knowingly and justly, and Johnson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy to posterity that knowledge, and, like an inventor of some useful art, to make a monopoly of his learning ; when thus, as I may say, before the use of the loadstone, or knowledge of the compass, I was sailing in a vast ocean, without other help than the pole-star of the Ancients, and the rules of the French stage amongst the Moderns, which are extremely different from ours, by reason of their opposite taste ; yet even then, I had the presumption to dedicate to your Lordship : a very unfinished piece, I must confess, and which only can be excused by the little experience of the author, and the modesty of the title An Essay. Yet I was stronger in prophecy than I was in criticism ; I was inspired to foretell you to mankind, as the restorer of poetry, the greatest genius, the truest judge, and the best patron.
35 I was drawing the outlines of an art, without any living

Good sense and good nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good nature, by which I mean beneficence and candour, is the product of right reason ; which of necessity will give allowance to the failings of others, by considering that there is nothing perfect in mankind ; and by distinguishing that which comes nearest to excellency, though not absolutely free from faults, will certainly produce a candour in the judge. 'Tis incident to an elevated understanding, like your Lordship's, to find out the errors of other men ; but it is your prerogative to pardon them ; to look with pleasure on those things, which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions ; and to forgive the many failings of those, who, with their wretched art, cannot arrive to those heights that you possess, from a happy, abundant, and native genius: which are as inborn to you, as they were to Shakespeare; and, for aught I know, to Homer; 5 in either of whom we find all arts and sciences, all moral and natural philosophy, without knowing that they ever studied them.

There is not an English writer this day living, who is not perfectly convinced that your Lordship excels all 10 others in all the several parts of poetry which you have undertaken to adorn. The most vain, and the most ambitious of our age, have not dared to assume so much, as the competitors of Themistocles: they have yielded the first place without dispute; and have been 15 arrogantly content to be esteemed as second to your Lordship; and even that also, with a longo, sed proximi intervallo. If there have been, or are any, who go further in their self-conceit, they must be very singular in their opinion; they must be like the officer in a play, 20 who was called Captain, Lieutenant, and Company. The world will easily conclude, whether such unattended generals can ever be capable of making a revolution in Parnassus.

I will not attempt, in this place, to say anything particular of your lyric poems, though they are the delight 25 and wonder of this age, and will be the envy of the next. The subject of this book confines me to Satire; and in that, an author of your own quality, (whose ashes I will not disturb,) has given you all the commendation 30 which his self-sufficiency could afford to any man: The best good man, with the worst-natur'd Muse. In that character, methinks, I am reading Johnson's verses to the memory of Shakespeare; an insolent, sparing, and invidious panegyric: where good nature, the most god- 35 like commendation of a man, is only attributed to your person, and denied to your writings ; for they are everywhere so full of candour, that, like Horace, you only expose the follies of men, without arraigning their vices ; and in this excel him, that you add that pointedness of thought, which is visibly wanting in our great Roman. 5 There is more of salt in all your verses, than I have seen in any of the Moderns, or even of the Ancients ; but you have been sparing of the gall, by which means you have pleased all readers, and offended none. Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your talent ; 10 but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification ; and were he translated into numbers, and English, he would yet be wanting in the dignity of expression. That which is the prime virtue, and chief ornament, of Virgil, which distinguishes him from the rest of writers, 15 is so conspicuous in your verses, that it casts a shadow on all your contemporaries ; we cannot be seen, or but obscurely, while you are present. You equal Donne in the variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts ; you excel him in the manner and the words. I read you 20 both with the same admiration, but not with the same delight. He affects the metaphysics, not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign ; and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should 25 engage their hearts, and entertain them with the softnesses of love. In this (if I may be pardoned for so bold a truth) Mr. Cowley has copied him to a fault ; so great a one, in my opinion, that it throws his Mistress infinitely below his Pindarics and his latter compositions, which are undoubtedly the best of his poems, and 30 the most correct. For my own part, I must avow it freely to the world, that I never attempted anything in satire, wherein I have not studied your writings as the most perfect model. I have continually laid them before 35 me; and the greatest commendation, which my own partiality can give to my productions, is, that they are copies, and no further to be allowed, than as they have something more or less of the original. Some few 5 touches of your Lordship, some secret graces which I have endeavoured to express after your manner, have made whole poems of mine to pass with approbation; but take your verses altogether, and they are inimitable. If therefore I have not written better, it is because 10 you have not written more. You have not set me sufficient copy to transcribe; and I cannot add one letter of my own invention, of which I have not the example there.

'Tis a general complaint against your Lordship, and 15 I must have leave to upbraid you with it, that, because you need not write, you will not. Mankind, that wishes you so well in all things that relate to your prosperity, have their intervals of wishing for themselves, and are within a little of grudging you the fulness of your for-20 tune: they would be more malicious if you used it not so well, and with so much generosity.

Fame is in itself a real good, if we may believe Cicero, who was perhaps too fond of it. But even fame, as Virgil tells us, acquires strength by going forward. Let 25 Epicurus give indolency as an attribute to his gods, and place in it the happiness of the blest; the Divinity which we worship has given us not only a precept against it, but his own example to the contrary. The world, my Lord, would be content to allow you a seventh day 30 for rest; or if you thought that hard upon you, we would not refuse you half your time: if you came out, like some great monarch, to take a town but once a year, as it were for your diversion, though you had no need to extend your territories. In short, if you were 35 a bad, or, which is worse, an indifferent poet, we would

thank you for our own quiet, and not expose you to the want of yours. But when you are so great and so successful, and when we have that necessity of your writing, that we cannot subsist entirely without it, any more (I may almost say) than the world without the daily course of ordinary providence, methinks this argument might prevail with you, my Lord, to forego a little of your repose for the public benefit. 'Tis not that you are under any force of working daily miracles, to prove your being; but now and then somewhat of extraordinary, that is, anything of your production, is requisite to refresh your character.

This, I think, my Lord, is a sufficient reproach to you; and should I carry it as far as mankind would authorise me, would be little less than satire. And, indeed, a provocation is almost necessary, in behalf of the world, that you might be induced sometimes to write; and in relation to a multitude of scribblers, who daily pester the world with their insufferable stuff, that they might be discouraged from writing any more. I complain not of their lampoons and libels, though I have been the public mark for many years. I am vindictive enough to have repelled force by force, if I could imagine that any of them had ever reached me; but they either shot at rovers, and therefore missed, or their powder was so weak, that I might safely stand them, at the nearest distance. I answered not The Rehearsal, because I knew the author sat to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bayes of his own farce: because also I knew, that my betters were more concerned than I was in that satire: and, lastly, because Mr. Smith and Mr. Johnson, the main pillars of it, were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, those noble characters of men of wit and pleasure about the town. The like considerations have hindered me from dealing with the lamentable companions of their prose and doggerel. I am so far from defending my poetry against them, 5 that I will not so much as expose theirs. And for my morals, if they are not proof against their attacks, let me be thought by posterity, what those authors would be thought, if any memory of them, or of their writings, could endure so long as to another age. But these dull 10 makers of lampoons, as harmless as they have been to me, are yet of dangerous example to the public. Some witty men may perhaps succeed⁶ to their designs, and, mixing sense with malice, blast the reputation of the most innocent amongst men, and the most virtuous 15 amongst women.

Heaven be praised, our common libellers are as free from the imputation of wit as of morality; and therefore whatever mischief they have designed, they have performed but little of it. Yet these ill-writers, in all 20 justice, ought themselves to be exposed; as Persius has given us a fair example in his First Satire, which is levelled particularly at them; and none is so fit to correct their faults, as he who is not only clear from any in his own writings, but is also so just, that he will 25 never defame the good; and is armed with the power of verse, to punish and make examples of the bad. But of this I shall have occasion to speak further, when I come to give the definition and character of true satires.

30 In the mean time, as a counsellor bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute laws may honestly inform a just prince how far his prerogative extends; so I may be allowed to tell your Lordship, who, by an undisputed title, are the king of poets, what 35 an extent of power you have, and how lawfully you may exercise it, over the petulant scribblers of this age. As Lord Chamberlain, I know, you are absolute by your office, in all that belongs to the decency and good manners of the stage. You can banish from thence scurrility and profaneness, and restrain the licentious ; insolence of poets, and their actors, in all things that shock the public quiet, or the reputation of private persons, under the notion of humour. But I mean not the authority, which is annexed to your office ; I speak of that only which is inborn and inherent to your ¹⁰ person ; what is produced in you by an excellent wit, a masterly and commanding genius over all writers : whereby you are empowered, when you please, to give the final decision of wit ; to put your stamp on all that ought to pass for current ; and set a brand of repro- ¹⁵ bation on clipt poetry, and false coin. A shilling dipped in the bath may go for gold amongst the ignorant, but the sceptres on the guineas show the difference. That your Lordship is formed by nature for this supremacy, I could easily prove, (were it not already granted by ²⁰ the world,) from the distinguishing character of your writing : which is so visible to me, that I never could be imposed on to receive for yours, what was written by any others ; or to mistake your genuine poetry for their spurious productions. I can further add, with truth, ²⁵ (though not without some vanity in saying it,) that in the same paper, written by divers hands, whereof your Lordship's was only part, I could separate your gold from their copper ; and though I could not give back to every author his own brass, (for there is not the same ³⁰ rule for distinguishing betwixt bad and bad, as betwixt ill and excellently good,) yet I never failed of knowing what was yours, and what was not ; and was absolutely certain, that this, or the other part, was positively yours, and could not possibly be written by any other. ³⁵

True it is, that some bad poems, though not all, carry their owners' marks about them. There is some peculiar awkwardness, false grammar, imperfect sense, or, at the least, obscurity; some brand or other on this 5 buttock, or that ear, that 'tis notorious who are the owners of the cattle, though they should not sign it with their names. But your Lordship, on the contrary, is distinguished, not only by the excellency of your thoughts, but by your style and manner of expressing 10 them. A painter, judging of some admirable piece, may affirm, with certainty, that it was of Holbein, or Vandyck; but vulgar designs, and common draughts, are easily mistaken, and misapplied. Thus, by my long study of your Lordship, I am arrived at the know-
15 ledge of your particular manner. In the good poems of other men, like those artists, I can only say, this is like the draught of such a one, or like the colouring of another. In short, I can only be sure, that 'tis the hand of a good master; but in your performances, it is 20 scarcely possible for me to be deceived. If you write in your strength, you stand revealed at the first view; and should you write under it, you cannot avoid some peculiar graces, which only cost me a second consideration to discover you: for I may say it, with all the 25 severity of truth, that every line of yours is precious. Your Lordship's only fault is, that you have not written more; unless I could add another, and that yet greater, but I fear for the public the accusation would not be true, that you have written, and out of a vicious modesty 30 will not publish.

Virgil has confined his works within the compass of eighteen thousand lines, and has not treated many subjects; yet he ever had, and ever will have, the reputation of the best poet. Martial says of him, that 35 he could have excelled Varius in tragedy, and Horace in lyric poetry, but out of deference to his friends, he attempted neither.

The same prevalence of genius is in your Lordship, but the world cannot pardon your concealing it on the same consideration ; because, we have neither a living Varius, nor a Horace in whose excellencies, both of poems, odes, and satires, you had equalled them, if our language had not yielded to the Roman majesty, and length of time had not added a reverence to the works of Horace. / For good sense is the same in all or most 10 ages ; and course of time rather improves Nature, than impairs her. / What has been, may be again : another Homer, and another Virgil, may possibly arise from those very causes which produced the first ; though it would be impudence to affirm, that any such have yet 15 appeared. /

It is manifest, that some particular ages have been more happy than others in the production of great men, in all sorts of arts and sciences ; as that of Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and the rest, for stage 20 poetry amongst the Greeks ; that of Augustus, for heroic, lyric, dramatic, elegiac, and indeed all sorts of poetry, in the persons of Virgil, Horace, Varius, Ovid, and many others ; especially if we take into that century the latter end of the commonwealth, wherein we 25 find Varro, Lucretius, and Catullus ; and at the same time lived Cicero, Sallust, and Cæsar. A famous age in modern times, for learning in every kind, was that of Lorenzo de Medici, and his son Leo the Tenth ; wherein painting was revived, and poetry flourished, 30 and the Greek language was restored.

Examples in all these are obvious : but what I would infer is this ; that in such an age, it is possible some great genius may arise, to equal any of the ancients ; abating only for the language. For great contem- 35 poraries whet and cultivate each other; and mutual borrowing, and commerce, makes the common riches of learning, as it does of the civil government.

But suppose that Homer and Virgil were the only of 5 their species, and that Nature was so much worn out in producing them, that she is never able to bear the like again, yet the example only holds in Heroic Poetry: in Tragedy and Satire, I offer myself to maintain against some of our modern critics, that this age and the last,
10 particularly in England, have excelled the ancients in both those kinds; and I would instance in Shakespeare of the former, in your Lordship of the latter sort¹.

Thus I might safely confine myself to my native country; but if I would only cross the seas, I might 15 find in France a living Horace and a Juvenal, in the person of the admirable Boileau; whose numbers are excellent, whose expressions are noble, whose thoughts are just, whose language is pure, whose satire is pointed, and whose sense is close; what he borrows from the 20 Ancients, he repays with usury of his own, in coin as good, and almost as universally valuable: for, setting prejudice and partiality apart, though he is our enemy, the stamp of a Louis, the patron of all arts, is not much inferior to the medal of an Augustus Cæsar.
25 Let this be said without entering into the interests of factions and parties, and relating only to the bounty of that king to men of learning and merit; a praise so just, that even we, who are his enemies, cannot refuse it to him.

30 Now if it may be permitted me to go back again to the consideration of Epic Poetry, I have confessed, that no man hitherto has reached, or so much as approached, to the excellencies of Homer, or of Virgil; I must further add, that Statius, the best versificator next to

¹ Of your Lordship in the latter sort. Ed. 1693.

Virgil, knew not how to design after him, though he had the model in his eye ; that Luçan is wanting both in design and subject, and is besides too full of heat and affectation ; that amongst the Moderns, Ariosto neither designed justly, nor observed any unity of action, or ; compass of time, or moderation in the vastness of his draught ; his style is luxurious, without majesty or decency, and his adventures without the compass of nature and possibility. Tasso, whose design was regular, and who observed the rules of unity in time 10 and place more closely than Virgil, yet was not so happy in his action ; he confesses himself to have been too lyrical, that is, to have written beneath the dignity of heroic verse, in his episodes of Sophronia, Erminia, and Armida ; his story is not so pleasing as Ariosto's ; 15 he is too flatulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry ; many times unequal, and almost always forced ; and, besides, is full of conceits, points of epigram, and witticisms ; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature : Virgil and 20 Homer have not one of them. And those who are guilty of so boyish an ambition in so grave a subject, are so far from being considered as heroic poets, that they ought to be turned down from Homer to the Anthologia, from Virgil to Martial and Owen's Epi- 25 grams, and from Spenser to Fleckno ; that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry. But to return to Tasso : he borrows from the invention of Boiardo, and in his alteration of his poem, which is infinitely for the worse, imitates Homer so very servilely, that (for 30 example) he gives the King of Jerusalem fifty sons, only because Homer had bestowed the like number on King Priam ; he kills the youngest in the same manner, and has provided his hero with a Patroclus, under another name, only to bring him back to the wars, when 35 his friend was killed. The French have performed nothing in this kind which is not far below those two Italians, and subject to a thousand more reflections, without examining their St. Lewis, their Pucelle, or 5 their Alaric. The English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them wanted either genius or learning to have been perfect poets, and yet both of them are liable to many censures. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser: he aims 10 at the accomplishment of no one action; he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures; and endows each of them with some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination, or preference. Every one is most valiant in his own legend:

15 only we must do him that justice to observe, that magnanimity, which is the character of Prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem; and succours the rest, when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of Queen Elizabeth;
20 and he attributed to each of them that virtue, which he thought was most conspicuous in them; an ingenious piece of flattery, though it turned not much to his account. Had he lived to finish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a
25 piece; but could not have been perfect, because the model was not true. But Prince Arthur, or his chief patron Sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make happy by the marriage of his Gloriana, dying before him, deprived the poet both of means and spirit to 30 accomplish his design: for the rest, his obsolete language, and the ill choice of his stanza, are faults but of the second magnitude; for, notwithstanding the first, he is still intelligible, at least after a little practice; and for the last, he is the more to be admired, that, labour-35 ing under such a difficulty, his verses are so numerous,

so various, and so harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he profestly imitated, has surpassed him among the Romans; and only Mr. Waller among the English.

As for Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with so much justice, his subject is not that of an Heroic Poem, properly so called. His design is the losing of our happiness; his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works; his heavenly machines are many, and his human persons are but two. But I will not take Mr. Rymer's work out of his hands. He has promised the world a critique on that author; wherein, though he will not allow his poem for heroic, I hope he will grant us, that his thoughts are elevated, his words sounding, and that no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Grecisms, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil. 'Tis true, he runs into a flat of thought, sometimes for a hundred lines together, but it is when he is got into a track of Scripture. His antiquated words were his choice, not his necessity; for therein he imitated Spenser, as Spenser did Chaucer. And though, perhaps, the love of their masters may have transported both too far, in the frequent use of them, yet, in my opinion, obsolete words may then be laudably revived, when either they are more sounding, or more significant, than those in practice; and when their obscurity is taken away, by joining other words to them, which clear the sense; according to the rule of Horace, for the admission of new words. But in both cases a moderation is to be observed in the use of them: for unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival, runs into affectation; a fault to be avoided on either hand. Neither will I justify Milton for his blank verse, though I may excuse him, by the example of Hannibal Caro, and other Italians, who have used it; for whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme, (which I have not now the leisure to examine,) his own particular reason is plainly this, that rhyme was not his talent ; he had neither the ease of doing it, nor the graces of it ;

5 which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth, where his rhyme is always constrained and forced, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant, and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymer, though not a poet.

10 By this time, my Lord, I doubt not but that you wonder, why I have run off from my bias so long together, and made so tedious a digression from satire to heroic poetry. But if you will not excuse it by the tattling quality of age, which, as Sir William D'Avenant
15 says, is always narrative, yet I hope the usefulness of what I have to say on this subject will qualify the remoteness of it ; and this is the last time I will commit the crime of prefaces, or trouble the world with my notions of anything that relates to verse. I have then,
20 as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the Moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem. Besides these, or the like animadversions of them by other men, there is yet a further reason given, why they cannot possibly succeed so well as the 25 Ancients, even though we could allow them not to be inferior, either in genius or learning, or the tongue in which they write, or all those other wonderful qualifications which are necessary to the forming of a true accomplished heroic poet. The fault is laid on our 30 religion ; they say, that Christianity is not capable of those embellishments which are afforded in the belief of those ancient heathens.

And 'tis true, that, in the severe notions of our faith, the fortitude of a Christian consists in patience, and 35 suffering, for the love of God, whatever hardships can befall him in the world ; not in any great attempt, or in performance of those enterprises which the poets call heroic, and which are commonly the effects of interest, ostentation, pride, and worldly honour: that humility and resignation are our prime virtues ; and that these 5 include no action, but that of the soul ; when as, on the contrary, an heroic poem requires to its necessary design, and as its last perfection, some great action of war, the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking ; which requires the strength and vigour of the 10 body, the duty of a soldier, the capacity and prudence of a general, and, in short, as much, or more, of the active virtue, than the suffering. But to this the answer is very obvious. God has placed us in our several stations ; the virtues of a private Christian are patience, 15 obedience, submission, and the like ; but those of a magistrate, or general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful command, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well as justice. So that this objection hinders not, but that an Epic Poem, or the heroic 20 action of some great commander, enterprised for the common good, and honour of the Christian cause, and executed happily, may be as well written now, as it was of old by the heathens ; provided the poet be endued with the same talents ; and the language, though not 25 of equal dignity, yet as near approaching to it, as our modern barbarism will allow, which is all that can be expected from our own, or any other now extant, though more refined ; and therefore we are to rest contented with that only inferiority, which is not possible to be 30 remedied.

I wish I could as easily remove that other difficulty which yet remains. 'Tis objected by a great French critic, as well as an admirable poet, yet living, and whom I have mentioned with that honour which his merit 35

English vs classical languages

exacts from me, I mean Boileau, that the machines of our Christian religion, in heroic poetry, are much more feeble to support that weight than those of heathenism. Their doctrine, grounded as it was on ridiculous fables, 5 was yet the belief of the two victorious Monarchies, the Grecian and Roman. Their gods did not only interest themselves in the event of wars, (which is the effect of a superior providence,) but also espoused the several parties in a visible corporeal descent, managed their 10 intrigues, and fought their battles sometimes in opposition to each other: though Virgil (more discreet than Homer in that last particular) has contented himself with the partiality of his deities, their favours, their counsels or commands, to those whose cause they had espoused, 15 without bringing them to the outrageousness of blows. Now, our religion (says he) is deprived of the greatest part of those machines; at least the most shining in epic poetry. Though St. Michael, in Ariosto, seeks out Discord, to send her among the Pagans, and finds her 20 in a convent of friars, where peace should reign, which indeed is fine satire; and Satan, in Tasso, excites Solyman to an attempt by night on the Christian camp, and brings an host of devils to his assistance; yet the archangel, in the former example, when Discord was restive, 25 and would not be drawn from her beloved monastery with fair words, has the whip-hand of her, drags her out with many stripes, sets her, on God's name, about her business, and makes her know the difference of strength betwixt a nuncio of Heaven, and a minister of Hell. 30 The same angel, in the latter instance from Tasso, (as if God had never another messenger belonging to the court, but was confined like Jupiter to Mercury, and Juno to Iris,) when he sees his time, that is, when half of the Christians are already killed, and all the rest are 35 in a fair way to be routed, stickles betwixt the remainders of God's host, and the race of fiends ; pulls the devils backward by the tails, and drives them from the quarry ; or otherwise the whole business had miscarried, and Jerusalem remained untaken. This, says Boileau, is a very unequal match for the poor devils, who are sure 5 to come by the worst of it in the combat ; for nothing is more easy, than for an Almighty Power to bring his old rebels to reason when he pleases. Consequently, what pleasure, what entertainment, can be raised from so pitiful a machine, where we see the success of the battle 10 from the very beginning of it ; unless that, as we are Christians, we are glad that we have gotten God on our side, to maul our enemies, when we cannot do the work ourselves ? For if the poet had given the faithful more courage, which had cost him nothing, or at least have 15 made them exceed the Turks in number, he might have gained the victory for us Christians, without interesting Heaven in the quarrel ; and that with as much ease, and as little credit to the conqueror, as when a party of a hundred soldiers defeats another which consists only 20 of fifty.

This, my Lord, I confess, is such an argument against our modern poetry, as cannot be answered by those mediums which have been used. We cannot hitherto boast, that our religion has furnished us with any such 25 machines, as have made the strength and beauty of the ancient buildings.

But what if I venture to advance an invention of my own, to supply the manifest defect of our new writers ? I am sufficiently sensible of my weakness ; and it is not 30 very probable that I should succeed in such a project, whereof I have not had the least hint from any of my predecessors, the poets, or any of their seconds and coadjutors, the critics. Yet we see the art of war is improved in sieges, and new instruments of death are 35 invented daily; something new in philosophy and the mechanics is discovered almost every year; and the science of former ages is improved by the succeeding. I will not detain you with a long preamble to that, which better judges will, perhaps, conclude to be little worth.

It is this, in short, that Christian poets have not hitherto been acquainted with their own strength. If they had searched the Old Testament as they ought, they might there have found the machines which are proper for their work; and those more certain in their effect, than it may be the New Testament is, in the rules sufficient for salvation. The perusing of one chapter in the prophecy of Daniel, and accommodating what there they find with the principles of Platonic philosophy, as it is now Christianised, would have made the ministry of angels as strong an engine, for the working up heroic poetry, in our religion, as that of the Ancients has been to raise theirs by all the fables of their gods, which were only received for truths by the most ignorant and weakest of the people.

'Tis a doctrine almost universally received by Christians, as well Protestants as Catholics, that there are guardian angels, appointed by God Almighty, as his vicegerents, for the protection and government of cities, provinces, kingdoms, and monarchies; and those as well of heathens, as of true believers. All this is so plainly proved from those texts of Daniel, that it admits of no further controversy. The prince of the Persians, and that other of the Grecians, are granted to be the guardians and protecting ministers of those empires. It cannot be denied, that they were opposite, and resisted one another. St. Michael is mentioned by his name as the patron of the Jews, and is now taken by the Christians, as the protector-general of our religion. These tutelar genii, who presided over the several people and regions committed to their charge, were watchful over them for good, as far as their commissions could possibly extend. The general purpose and design of all was certainly the service of their Great Creator. But 'tis an undoubted 5 truth, that, for ends best known to the Almighty Majesty of Heaven, his providential designs for the benefit of his creatures, for the debasing and punishing of some nations, and the exaltation and temporal reward of others, were not wholly known to these his ministers ; 10 else why those factious quarrels, controversies, and battles amongst themselves, when they were all united in the same design, the service and honour of their common Master ? But being instructed only in the general, and zealous of the main design ; and, as infinite 15 beings, not admitted into the secrets of government, the last resorts of providence, or capable of discovering the final purposes of God, who can work good out of evil as he pleases, and irresistibly sways all manner of events on earth, directing them finally for the best, to 20 his creation in general, and to the ultimate end of his own glory in particular ; they must, of necessity, be sometimes ignorant of the means conducing to those ends, in which alone they can jar and oppose each other. One angel, as we may suppose the Prince of Persia, as 25 he is called, judging, that it would be more for God's honour, and the benefit of his people, that the Median and Persian Monarchy, which delivered them from the Babylonish captivity, should still be uppermost ; and the patron of the Grecians, to whom the will of God 30 might be more particularly revealed, contending, on the other side, for the rise of Alexander and his successors, who were appointed to punish the backsliding Jews, and thereby to put them in mind of their offences, that they might repent, and become more virtuous, and more 35 observant of the law revealed. But how far these controversies and appearing enmities of those glorious creatures may be carried; how these oppositions may best be managed, and by what means conducted, is not 5 my business to show or determine; these things must be left to the invention and judgment of the poet; if any of so happy a genius be now living, or any future age can produce a man, who, being conversant in the philosophy of Plato, as it is now accommodated to

10 Christian use, (for, as Virgil gives us to understand by his example, that is the only proper, of all others, for an epic poem,) who, to his natural endowments, of a large invention, a ripe judgment, and a strong memory, has joined the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences, 15 and particularly moral philosophy, the mathematics, geography, and history, and with all these qualifications is born a poet; knows, and can practise the variety of numbers, and is master of the language in which he writes;—if such a man, I say, be now arisen, or shall 20 arise, I am vain enough to think, that I have proposed a model to him, by which he may build a nobler, a more beautiful and more perfect poem, than any yet extant since the Ancients.

There is another part of these machines yet wanting;
25 but, by what I have said, it would have been easily supplied by a judicious writer. He could not have failed to add the opposition of ill spirits to the good; they have also their design, ever opposite to that of Heaven; and this alone has hitherto been the practice of the 30 Moderns: but this imperfect system, if I may call it such, which I have given, will infinitely advance and carry further that hypothesis of the evil spirits contending with the good. For, being so much weaker, since their fall, than those blessed beings, they are yet sup-
35 posed to have a permitted power from God of acting ill,

as, from their own depraved nature, they have always the will of designing it. A great testimony of which we find in holy writ, when God Almighty suffered Satan to appear in the holy synod of the angels, (a thing not hitherto drawn into example by any of the poets,) and also gave him power over all things belonging to his servant Job, excepting only life.

Now, what these wicked spirits cannot compass, by the vast disproportion of their forces to those of the superior beings, they may by their fraud and cunning carry farther, in a seeming league, confederacy, or subserviency to the designs of some good angel, as far as consists with his purity to suffer such an aid, the end of which may possibly be disguised, and concealed from his finite knowledge. This is, indeed, to suppose a great error in such a being; yet since a devil can appear like an angel of light; since craft and malice may sometimes blind for a while a more perfect understanding; and, lastly, since Milton has given us an example of the like nature, when Satan, appearing like a cherub to Uriel, the Intelligence of the Sun, circumvented him even in his own province, and passed only for a curious traveller through those new-created regions, that he might observe therein the workmanship of God, and praise him in his works; I know not why, upon the same supposition, or some other, a fiend may not deceive a creature of more excellency than himself, but yet a creature; at least, by the connivance, or tacit permission, of the Omniscent Being.

Thus, my Lord, I have, as briefly as I could, given your Lordship, and by you the world, a rude draught of what I have been long labouring in my imagination, and what I had intended to have put in practice, (though far unable for the attempt of such a poem,) and to have left the stage, (to which my genius never much inclined me,) for a work which would have taken up my life in the performance of it. This, too, I had intended chiefly for the honour of my native country, to which a poet is particularly obliged. Of two subjects, both relating to 5 it, I was doubtful whether I should choose that of King Arthur conquering the Saxons, which, being farther distant in time, gives the greater scope to my invention ; or that of Edward, the Black Prince, in subduing Spain, and restoring it to the lawful prince, though a great

10 tyrant, Don Pedro the Cruel : which, for the compass of time, including only the expedition of one year ; for the greatness of the action, and its answerable event ; for the magnanimity of the English hero, opposed to the ingratitude of the person whom he restored ; and 15 for the many beautiful episodes, which I had interwoven with the principal design, together with the characters of the chiefest English persons ; wherein, after Virgil and Spenser, I would have taken occasion to represent my living friends and patrons of the noblest families,
20 and also shadowed the events of future ages, in the succession of our imperial line ; with these helps, and those of the machines, which I have mentioned, I might perhaps have done as well as some of my predecessors, or at least chalked out a way for others to amend my 25 errors in a like design. But being encouraged only with fair words by King Charles II, my little salary ill paid, and no prospect of a future subsistence, I was then discouraged in the beginning of my attempt ; and now age has overtaken me, and want, a more insufferable 30 evil, through the change of the times, has wholly disabled me. Though I must ever acknowledge, to the honour of your Lordship, and the eternal memory of your charity, that, since this revolution, wherein I have patiently suffered the ruin of my small fortune, and the kings, whom I had served more faithfully than profitably to myself; then your Lordship was pleased, out of no other motive but your own nobleness, without any desert of mine, or the least solicitation from me, to make me a most bountiful present, which at that time, when 5 I was most in want of it, came most seasonably and unexpectedly to my relief. That favour, my Lord, is of itself sufficient to bind any grateful man to a perpetual acknowledgment, and to all the future service which one of my mean condition can ever be able to perform. 10 May the Almighty God return it for me, both in blessing you here, and rewarding you hereafter! I must not presume to defend the cause for which I now suffer, because your Lordship is engaged against it; but the more you are so, the greater is my obligation to you, 15 for your laying aside all the considerations of factions and parties, to do an action of pure disinterested charity. This is one amongst many of your shining qualities, which distinguish you from others of your rank. But let me add a farther truth, that, without these ties of 20 gratitude, and abstracting from them all, I have a most particular inclination to honour you; and, if it were not too bold an expression, to say, I love you. 'Tis no shame to be a poet, though 'tis to be a bad one. Augustus Cæsar of old, and Cardinal Richelieu of late, 25 would willingly have been such; and David and Solomon were such. You who, without flattery, are the best of the present age in England, and would have been so, had you been born in any other country, will receive more honour in future ages by that one excellency, than 30 by all those honours to which your birth has entitled you, or your merits have acquired you.
35 loss of that poor subsistence which I had from two

Ne, forte, pudori

Sit tibi Musa lyre solers, et cantor Apollo.

I have formerly said in this Epistle, that I could dis- 35 tinguish your writings from those of any others ; 'tis now time to clear myself from any imputation of self-conceit on that subject. I assume not to myself any particular lights in this discovery ; they are such only as are obvious to every man of sense and judgment, who loves poetry, and understands it. Your thoughts are always so remote from the common way of thinking, that they are, as I may say, of another species than the conceptions of other poets ; yet you go not out of nature for any of them. Gold is never bred upon the surface of the ground, but lies so hidden, and so deep, that the mines of it are seldom found ; but the force of waters casts it out from the bowels of mountains, and exposes it amongst the sands of rivers ; giving us of her bounty what we could not hope for by our search. This success attends your Lordship's thoughts, which would look like chance, if it were not perpetual, and always of the same tenour. If I grant that there is care in it, 'tis such a care as would be ineffectual and fruitless in other men. 'Tis the curiosa felicitas which Petronius ascribes to Horace in his Odes. We have not wherewithal to imagine so strongly, so justly, and so pleasantly ; in short, if we have the same knowledge, we cannot draw out of it the same quintessence ; we cannot give it such a turn, such a propriety, and such a beauty ; something is deficient in the manner, or the words, but more in the nobleness of our conception. Yet when you have finished all, and it appears in its full lustre, when the diamond is not only found, but the roughness smoothed, when it is cut into a form, and set in gold, then we cannot but acknowledge, that it is the perfect work of art and nature ; and every one will be so vain, to think he himself could have performed the like, till he attempts it. It is just the description that Horace makes of such a finished piece : it appears so easy,

. . . Ut sibi quisvis

Speret idem, sudet multum. frustra que labore, Ausus idem.

And, besides all this, 'tis your Lordship's particular talent to lay your thoughts so close together, that, were 5 they closer, they would be crowded, and even a due connexion would be wanting. We are not kept in expectation of two good lines, which are to come after a long parenthesis of twenty bad; which is the April poetry of other writers, a mixture of rain and sunshine 10 by fits: you are always bright, even almost to a fault, by reason of the excess. There is continual abundance, a magazine of thought, and yet a perpetual variety of entertainment; which creates such an appetite in your reader, that he is not cloyed with anything, but satisfied 15 with all. 'Tis that which the Romans call cæna dubia; where there is such plenty, yet withal so much diversity, and so good order, that the choice is difficult betwixt one excellency and another; and yet the conclusion, by a due climax, is evermore the best; that is, as a con- 20 clusion ought to be, ever the most proper for its place. See, my Lord, whether I have not studied your Lordship with some application; and, since you are so modest, that you will not be judge and party, I appeal to the whole world, if I have not drawn your picture 25 to a great degree of likeness, though it is but in miniature, and that some of the best features are yet wanting. Yet what I have done is enough to distinguish you from any other, which is the proposition that I took upon me to demonstrate. 30

And now, my Lord, to apply what I have said to my present business: the Satires of Juvenal and Persius appearing in this new English dress cannot so properly be inscribed to any man as to your Lordship, who are the first of the age in that way of writing. 35

Your Lordship, amongst many other favours, has given me your permission for this address; and you have particularly encouraged me by your perusal and approbation of the Sixth and Tenth Satires of Juvenal, as 5 I have translated them. My fellow-labourers have likewise commissioned me to perform, in their behalf, this office of a Dedication to you; and will acknowledge, with all possible respect and gratitude, your acceptance of their work. Some of them have the honour to be 10 known to your Lordship already; and they who have not yet that happiness desire it now. Be pleased to receive our common endeavours with your wonted candour, without intitling you to the protection of our common failings in so difficult an undertaking. And 15 allow me your patience, if it be not already tired with this long epistle, to give you, from the best authors, the origin, the antiquity, the growth, the change, and the completement of Satire among the Romans; to describe, if not define, the nature of that poem, with its several 20 qualifications and virtues, together with the several sorts of it; to compare the excellencies of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal, and show the particular manners of their satires; and, lastly, to give an account of this new way of version, which is attempted in our perform-25 ance. All which, according to the weakness of my ability, and the best lights which I can get from others, shall be the subject of my following discourse.

The most perfect work of Poetry, says our master Aristotle, is Tragedy. His reason is, because it is the 30 most united; being more severely confined within the rules of action, time, and place. The action is entire, of a piece, and one, without episodes; the time limited to a natural day; and the place circumscribed at least within the compass of one town, or city. Being exactly 35 proportioned thus, and uniform in all its parts, the mind is more capable of comprehending the whole beauty of it without distraction.

But after all these advantages, an Heroic Poem is certainly the greatest work of human nature. The beauties and perfections of the other are but mechanical ; 5 those of the Epic are more noble : though Homer has limited his place to Troy, and the fields about it ; his actions to forty-eight natural days, whereof twelve are holidays, or cessation from business, during the funeral of Patroclus. To proceed ; the action of the Epic is 10 greater ; the extension of time enlarges the pleasure of the reader, and the episodes give it more ornament, and more variety. The instruction is equal ; but the first is only instructive, the latter forms a hero, and a prince. 15

If it signifies anything which of them is of the more ancient family, the best and most absolute Heroic Poem was written by Homer long before Tragedy was invented. But if we consider the natural endowments and acquired parts which are necessary to make an 20 accomplished writer in either kind, Tragedy requires a less and more confined knowledge ; moderate learning, and observation of the rules, is sufficient, if a genius be not wanting. But in an epic poet, one who is worthy of that name, besides an universal genius, is required 25 universal learning, together with all those qualities and acquisitions which I have named above, and as many more as I have, through haste or negligence, omitted. And, after all, he must have exactly studied Homer and Virgil as his patterns ; Aristotle and Horace as his 30 guides ; and Vida and Bossu as their commentators ; with many others, both Italian and French critics, which I want leisure here to recommend.

In a word, what I have to say in relation to this subject, which does not particularly concern Satire, is, 35 that the greatness of an heroic poem, beyond that of a tragedy, may easily be discovered, by observing how few have attempted that work in comparison to those who have written dramas ; and, of those few, how small 5 a number have succeeded. But leaving the critics, on either side, to contend about the preference due to this or that sort of poetry, I will hasten to my present business, which is the antiquity and origin of Satire, according to those informations which I have received 10 from the learned Casaubon, Heinsius, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the Dauphin's Juvenal ; to which I shall add some observations of my own.

There has been a long dispute among the modern critics, whether the Romans derived their Satire from 15 the Grecians, or first invented it themselves. Julius Scaliger, and Heinsius, are of the first opinion ; Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the publisher of the Dauphin's Juvenal, maintain the latter. If we take Satire in the general signification of the word, as it
20 is used in all modern languages, for an invective, it is certain that it is almost as old as verse ; and though hymns, which are praises of God, may be allowed to have been before it, yet the defamation of others was not long after it. After God had cursed Adam and Eve
25 in Paradise, the husband and wife excused themselves, by laying the blame on one another ; and gave a beginning to those conjugal dialogues in prose, which the poets have perfected in verse. The third chapter of Job is one of the first instances of this poem in holy 30 Scripture ; unless we will take it higher, from the latter end of the second, where his wife advises him to curse his Maker.

This original, I confess, is not much to the honour of satire ; but here it was nature, and that depraved : when 35 it became an art, it bore better fruit. Only we have learnt thus much already, that scoffs and revilings are of the growth of all nations; and, consequently, that neither the Greek poets borrowed from other people their art of railing, neither needed the Romans to take it from them. But, considering Satire as a species of poetry, here the war begins amongst the critics. Scaliger, the father, will have it descend from Greece to Rome; and derives the word Satire from Satyrus, that mixed kind of animal, or, as the ancients thought him, rural god, made up betwixt a man and a goat; with a human head, hooked nose, pouting lips, a bunch, or struma, under the chin, pricked ears, and upright horns; the body shagged with hair, especially from the waist, and ending in a goat, with the legs and feet of that creature. But Casaubon, and his followers, with reason, condemn this derivation; and prove, that from Satyrus, the word satira, as it signifies a poem, cannot possibly descend. For satira is not properly a substantive, but an adjective; to which the word lanx (in English, a charger, or large platter) is understood; so that the Greek poem, made according to the manners of a Satyr, and expressing his qualities, must properly be called satyrical, and not Satire. And thus far 'tis allowed that the Grecians had such poems; but that they were wholly different in specie from that to which the Romans gave the name of Satire.

Aristotle divides all Poetry, in relation to the progress of it, into nature without art, art begun, and art completed. Mankind, even the most barbarous, have the seeds of poetry implanted in them. The first specimen of it was certainly shown in the praises of the Deity, and prayers to him; and as they are of natural obligation, so they are likewise of divine institution: which Milton observing, introduces Adam and Eve every morning adoring God in hymns and prayers. The first poetry was thus begun, in the wild notes of natural poetry, before the invention of feet, and measures. The Grecians and Romans had no other original of their poetry. Festivals and holidays soon succeeded to 5 private worship, and we need not doubt but they were enjoined by the true God to his own people, as they were afterwards imitated by the heathens; who, by the light of reason, knew they were to invoke some superior Being in their necessities, and to thank him for his 10 benefits. Thus, the Grecian holidays were celebrated with offerings to Bacchus, and Ceres, and other deities, to whose bounty they supposed they were owing for their corn and wine, and other helps of life. And the ancient Romans, as Horace tells us, paid their 15 thanks to mother Earth, or Vesta, to Silvanus, and their Genius, in the same manner. But as all festivals have a double reason of their institution, the first of religion, the other of recreation, for the unbending of our minds, so both the Grecians and Romans agreed, 20 after their sacrifices were performed, to spend the remainder of the day in sports and merriments; amongst which, songs and dances, and that which they called wit, (for want of knowing better,) were the chiefest entertainments. The Grecians had a notion of Satyrs, whom 25 I have already described; and taking them, and the Sileni, that is, the young Satyrs and the old, for the tutors, attendants, and humble companions of their Bacchus, habited themselves like those rural deities, and imitated them in their rustic dances, to which they 30 joined songs, with some sort of rude harmony, but without certain numbers; and to these they added a kind of chorus.

The Romans, also, (as Nature is the same in all places,) though they knew nothing of those Grecian 35 demi-gods, nor had any communication with Greece, yet had certain young men, who, at their festivals, danced and sung, after their uncouth manner, to a certain kind of verse, which they called Saturnian. What it was, we have no certain light from antiquity to discover; but we may conclude, that, like the Grecian, it was void of art, or, at least, with very feeble beginnings of it. Those ancient Romans, at these holidays, which were a mixture of devotion and debauchery, had a custom of reproaching each other with their faults, in a sort of ex tempore poetry, or rather of tunable hobbling verse; and they answered in the same kind of gross raillery; their wit and their music being of a piece. The Grecians, says Casaubon, had formerly done the same, in the persons of their petulant Satyrs: but I am afraid he mistakes the matter, and confounds the singing and dancing of the Satyrs with the rustical entertainments of the first Romans. The reason of my opinion is this: that Casaubon, finding little light from antiquity of these beginnings of Poetry amongst the Grecians, but only these representations of Satyrs, who carried canisters and cornucopias full of several fruits in their hands, and danced with them at their public feasts; and afterwards reading Horace, who makes mention of his homely Romans jesting at one another in the same kind of solemnities, might suppose those wanton Satyrs did the same; and especially because Horace possibly might seem to him to have shown the original of all Poetry in general, including the Grecians as well as Romans; though it is plainly otherwise, that he only described the beginning and first rudiments of Poetry in his own country. The verses are these, which he cites from the First Epistle of the Second Book, which was written to Augustus—

Agricolæ prisci, fortes, parvoque beati, Condita post frumenta, levantes tempore festo

*Corpus, et ipsum animum spe finis dura ferentem, Cum sociis operum, et pueris, et conjuge fida,
 Tellurem porco, Silvanum lacte piabant;
 Floribus et vino Genium memorem brevis ævi:
 5 Fescemina per hunc inventa licentia morem
 Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fudit.*

Our brawny clowns, of old, who turn'd the soil,
 Content with little, and inur'd to toil,
 At harvest-home, with mirth and country cheer,
 10 Restor'd their bodies for another year;
 Refresh'd their spirits, and renew'd their hope
 Of such a future feast, and future crop.
 Then, with their fellow-joggers of the ploughs,
 Their little children, and their faithful spouse,
 15 A sow they slew to Vesta's deity,
 And kindly milk, Silvanus, pour'd to thee;
 With flow'rs, and wine, their Genius they adored;
 A short life, and a merry, was the word.
 From flowing cups, defaming rhymes ensue,
 20 And at each other homely taunts they threw.

Yet since it is a hard conjecture, that so great a man as Casaubon should misapply what Horace writ concerning ancient Rome, to the ceremonies and manners of ancient Greece, I will not insist on this opinion, but 25 rather judge in general, that since all Poetry had its original from religion, that of the Grecians and Rome had the same beginning: both were invented at festivals of thanksgiving, and both were prosecuted with mirth and raillery, and rudiments of verses: amongst the 30 Greeks, by those who represented Satyrs; and amongst the Romans, by real clowns.

For, indeed, when I am reading Casaubon on these two subjects, methinks I hear the same story told twice over with very little alteration. Of which Dacier taking 35 notice, in his interpretation of the Latin verses which I have translated, says plainly, that the beginning of Poetry was the same, with a small variety, in both countries; and that the mother of it, in all nations, was devotion. But, what is yet more wonderful, that most learned critic takes notice also, in his illustrations on the First Epistle of the Second Book, that as the poetry of the Romans, and that of the Grecians, had the same beginning, (at feasts and thanksgiving, as it has been observed,) and the Old Comedy of the Greeks, which was invective, and the Satire of the Romans, which was of the same nature, were begun on the very same occasion, so the fortune of both, in process of time, was just the same; the Old Comedy of the Grecians was forbidden, for its too much licence in exposing of particular persons; and the rude Satire of the Romans was also punished by a law of the Decemviri, as Horace tells us, in these words—

Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos 15
Lusit amabiliter; donec jam sævus apertam
In rabiem verti cepit focus, et per honestas
Ire domos impune minax: doluere cruento
Dente lacessiti; fuit intactis quoque cura
Conditione super communi: quin etiam lex, 20
Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quenquam
Describi: vertere modum, formidine fustis
Ad benedicendum delectandumque redacti.

The law of the Decemviri was this: Siquis occentassit malum carmen, sive condidisset, quod infamiam faxit, flagitiumve alteri, capital esto. A strange likeness, and barely possible; but the critics being all of the same opinion, it becomes me to be silent, and to submit to better judgments than my own.

But, to return to the Grecians, from whose satyric dramas the elder Scaliger and Heinsius will have the Roman Satire to proceed, I am to take a view of them first, and to see if there be any such descent from them as those authors have pretended.

Thespis, or whoever he were that invented Tragedy, (for authors differ,) mingled with them a chorus and dances of Satyrs, which had before been used in the celebration of their festivals; and there they were ever afterwards retained. The character of them was also kept, which was mirth and wantonness; and this was 5 given, I suppose, to the folly of the common audience, who soon grow weary of good sense, and, as we daily see in our own age and country, are apt to forsake poetry, and still ready to return to buffoonry and farce. From hence it came, that, in the Olympic games, where 10 the poets contended for four prizes, the satyric tragedy was the last of them; for, in the rest, the Satyrs were excluded from the chorus. Among the plays of Euripides which are yet remaining, there is one of these Satyrics, which is called the Cyclops; in which we may 15 see the nature of those poems, and from thence conclude what likeness they have to the Roman satire.

The story of this Cyclops, whose name was Polyphemus, so famous in the Grecian fables, was, that Ulysses, who, with his company, was driven on that 20 coast of Sicily, where those Cyclops inhabited, coming to ask relief from Silenus, and the Satyrs, who were herdsmen to that one-eyed giant, was kindly received by them, and entertained; till, being perceived by Polyphemus, they were made prisoners against the 25 rites of hospitality, (for which Ulysses eloquently pleaded,) were afterwards put down into the den, and some of them devoured; after which Ulysses, having made him drunk, when he was asleep, thrust a great firebrand into his eye, and so, revenging his dead
30 followers, escaped with the remaining party of the living; and Silenus and the Satyrs were freed from their servitude under Polyphemus, and remitted to their first liberty of attending and accompanying their patron, Bacchus.

35 This was the subject of the tragedy; which, being one of those that end with a happy event, is therefore, by Aristotle, judged below the other sort, whose success is unfortunate. Notwithstanding which, the Satyrs, who were part of the dramatis personæ, as well as the whole chorus, were properly introduced into the nature of the 5 poem, which is mixed of farce and tragedy. The adventure of Ulysses was to entertain the judging part of the audience; and the uncouth persons of Silenus, and the Satyrs, to divert the common people with their gross railleries. 10

Your Lordship has perceived by this time, that this satyric tragedy, and the Roman Satire, have little resemblance in any of their features. The very kinds are different; for what has a pastoral tragedy to do with a paper of verses satirically written? The character 15 and raillery of the Satyrs is the only thing that could pretend to a likeness, were Scaliger and Heinsius alive to maintain their opinion. And the first farces of the Romans, which were the rudiments of their poetry, were written before they had any communication with 20 the Greeks, or indeed any knowledge of that people.

And here it will be proper to give the definition of the Greek satyric poem from Casaubon, before I leave this subject. "The Satyric," says he, "is a dramatic poem, annexed to a tragedy, having a chorus, which 25 consists of Satyrs. The persons represented in it are illustrious men; the action of it is great; the style is partly serious, and partly jocular; and the event of the action most commonly is happy."

The Grecians, besides these satyric tragedies, had 30 another kind of poem, which they called silli, which were more of kin to the Roman satire. Those silli were indeed invective poems, but of a different species from the Roman poems of Ennius, Pacuvius, Lucilius, Horace, and the rest of their successors. They were 35 so called, says Casaubon in one place, from Silenus, the foster-father of Bacchus; but, in another place, bethinking himself better, he derives their name ἀπὸ τοῦ σιλλαίνειν, from their scoffing and petulancy. From 5 some fragments of the silli, written by Timon, we may find that they were satyric poems, full of parodies; that is, of verses patched up from great poets, and turned into another sense than their author intended them. Such, amongst the Romans, is the famous Cento

10 of Ausonius; where the words are Virgil's, but, by applying them to another sense, they are made a relation of a wedding-night; and the act of consummation fulsomely described in the very words of the most modest amongst all poets. Of the same manner are 15 our songs, which are turned into burlesque, and the serious words of the author perverted into a ridiculous meaning. Thus in Timon's Silli the words are generally those of Homer, and the tragic poets; but he applies them, satirically, to some customs and kinds 20 of philosophy, which he arraigns. But the Romans, not using any of these parodies in their satires,—sometimes, indeed, repeating verses of other men, as Persius cites some of Nero's, but not turning them into another meaning,—the silli cannot be supposed to be the original 25 of Roman satire. To these silli, consisting of parodies, we may properly add the satires which were written against particular persons; such as were the iambics of Archilochus against Lycambes, which Horace undoubtedly imitated in some of his Odes and Epodes, 30 whose titles bear sufficient witness of it. I might also name the invective of Ovid against Ibis, and many others; but these are the underwood of Satire, rather than the timber-trees: they are not of general extension, as reaching only to some individual person. And 35 Horace seems to have purged himself from those splenetic reflections in his Odes and Epodes, before he undertook the noble work of Satires, which were properly so called.

Thus, my Lord, I have at length disengaged myself from those antiquities of Greece; and have proved, ⁵ I hope, from the best critics, that the Roman Satire was not borrowed from thence, but of their own manufacture. I am now almost gotten into my depth; at least, by the help of Dacier, I am swimming towards it. Not that I will promise always to follow him, any more ¹⁰ than he follows Casaubon; but to keep him in my eye, as my best and truest guide; and where I think he may possibly mislead me, there to have recourse to my own lights, as I expect that others should do by me.

Quintilian says, in plain words, Satira quidem tota ¹⁵ nostra est; and Horace had said the same thing before him, speaking of his predecessor in that sort of poetry, et Græcis intacti carminis auctor. Nothing can be clearer than the opinion of the poet, and the orator, both the best critics of the two best ages of the Roman Em- ²⁰ pire, that Satire was wholly of Latin growth, and not transplanted to Rome from Athens. Yet, as I have said, Scaliger, the father, according to his custom, that is, insolently enough, contradicts them both; and gives no better reason, than the derivation of satyrus ²⁵ from σαθυρ, salacitas; and so, from the lechery of those Fauns, thinks he has sufficiently proved that satire is derived from them: as if wantonness and lubricity were essential to that sort of poem, which ought to be avoided in it. His other allegation, which ³⁰ I have already mentioned, is as pitiful; that the Satyrs carried platters and canisters full of fruit in their hands. If they had entered empty-handed, had they been ever the less Satyrs? Or were the fruits and flowers, which they offered, anything of kin to satire? Or any argu- ³⁵

ment that this poem was originally Grecian? Casaubon judged better, and his opinion is grounded on sure authority, that Satire was derived from satura, a Roman word, which signifies full and abundant, and full also of variety, in which nothing is wanting to its due perfection. It is thus, says Dacier, that we say a full colour, when the wool has taken the whole tincture, and drunk in as much of the dye as it can receive. According to this derivation, from satur comes satura; or satira, according to the new spelling; as oplumus and maxumus are now spelled optimus and maximus. Satura, as I have formerly noted, is an adjective, and relates to the word lanx, which is understood; and this lanx, in English a charger, or large platter, was yearly filled with all sorts of fruits, which were offered to the gods at their festivals, as the premices, or first gatherings. These offerings of several sorts thus mingled, it is true, were not unknown to the Grecians, who called them πανκαρπὸν θυσίαν, a sacrifice of all sorts of fruits; and πανσπερμίαν, when they offered all kinds of grain. Virgil has mentioned those sacrifices in his Georgics :—

Lancibus et pandis fumantia reddimus exta :

and in another place, lancesque et liba feremus : that is, we offer the smoking entrails in great platters, and we will offer the chargers and the cakes.

The word satura has been afterwards applied to many other sorts of mixtures; as Festus calls it a kind of olla, or hotchpotch, made of several sorts of meats. Laws were also called leges saturæ, when they were of several heads and titles, like our tacked bills of Parliament. And per saturam legem ferre, in the Roman senate, was to carry a law without telling the senators, or counting voices, when they were in haste. Sallust uses the word, per saturam sententias exquirere, when the majority was visible on one side. From hence it may probably be conjectured, that the Discourses, or Satires, of Ennius, Lucilius, and Horace, as we now call them, took their name; because they are full of various matters, and are also written on various subjects, as Porphyrius says. But Dacier affirms that it is not immediately from thence that these satires are so called; for that name had been used formerly for other things, which bore a nearer resemblance to those discourses of Horace. In explaining of which, continues Dacier, a method is to be pursued, of which 10 Casaubon himself has never thought, and which will put all things into so clear a light, that no further room will be left for the least dispute.

During the space of almost four hundred years, since the building of their city, the Romans had never known 15 any entertainments of the stage. Chance and jollity first found out those verses which they called Saturnian and Fescennine; or rather human nature, which is inclined to poetry, first produced them, rude and barbarous, and unpolished, as all other operations of the 20 soul are in their beginnings, before they are cultivated with art and study. However, in occasions of merriment they were first practised; and this rough-cast unhewn poetry was instead of stage-plays for the space of an hundred and twenty years together. They were 25 made ex tempore, and were, as the French call them, impromptus; for which the Tarsians of old were much renowned; and we see the daily examples of them in the Italian farces of Harlequin and Scaramucha. Such was the poetry of that savage people, before it was 30 turned into numbers, and the harmony of verse. Little of the Saturnian verses is now remaining; we only know from authors that they were nearer prose than poetry, without feet, or measure. They were ἐρυσθμοι, but not ἐμμετροι; perhaps they might be used in the 35 solemn part of their ceremonies; and the Fescennine, which were invented after them, in the afternoon's debauchery, because they were scoffing and obscene.

The Fescennine and Saturnian were the same; for 5 as they were called Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy, they were also called Fescennine, from Fescennia, a town in the same country, where they were first practised. The actors, with a gross and rustic kind of raillery, reproached
 10 each other with their failings; and at the same time were nothing sparing of it to their audience. Somewhat of this custom was afterwards retained in their Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, celebrated in December; at least all kind of freedom in speech was then allowed 15 to slaves even against their masters; and we are not without some imitation of it in our Christmas gambols. Soldiers also used those Fescennine verses, after measure and numbers had been added to them, at the triumph of their generals: of which we have an 20 example, in the triumph of Julius Cæsar over Gaul, in these expressions:

*Cæsar Gallias subegit, Nicomedes Cæsarem : Ecce Cæsar nunc triumphat, qui subegit Gallias :
 Nicomedes non triumphat, qui subegit Cæsarem.*

25 The vapours of wine made those first satirical poets amongst the Romans; which, says Dacier, we cannot better represent, than by imagining a company of clowns on a holiday, dancing lubberly, and upbraiding one another, in ex tempore doggerel, with their defects
 30 and vices, and the stories that were told of them in bakehouses and barbers' shops.

When they began to be somewhat better bred, and were entering, as I may say, into the first rudiments of civil conversation, they left these hedge-notes for another 35 sort of poem, somewhat polished, which was also full of pleasant raillery, but without any mixture of obscenity. This sort of poetry appeared under the name of satire, because of its variety; and this satire was adorned with compositions of music, and with dances; but lascivious postures were banished from it. In the Tuscan language, 5 says Livy, the word hister signifies a player; and therefore those actors, which were first brought from Etruria to Rome, on occasion of a pestilence, when the Romans were admonished to avert the anger of the Gods by plays, in the year ab urbe condita cccxc., those actors, 10 I say, were therefore called histriones; and that name has since remained, not only to actors Roman born, but to all others of every nation. They played not the former ex tempore stuff of Fescennine verses, or clownish jests; but what they acted was a kind of civil, cleanly 15 farce, with music and dances, and motions that were proper to the subject.

In this condition Livius Andronicus found the stage, when he attempted first, instead of farces, to supply it with a nobler entertainment of tragedies and comedies. 20 This man was a Grecian born, and being made a slave by Livius Salinator, and brought to Rome, had the education of his patron's children committed to him; which trust he discharged so much to the satisfaction of his master, that he gave him his liberty. 25

Andronicus, thus become a freeman of Rome, added to his own name that of Livius his master; and, as I observed, was the first author of a regular play in that commonwealth. Being already instructed, in his native country, in the manners and decencies of the 30 Athenian theatre, and conversant in the Archæa Comædia, or Old Comedy of Aristophanes, and the rest of the Grecian poets, he took from that model his own designing of plays for the Roman stage; the first of which was represented in the year 514 since the building of 35

Rome, as Tully, from the commentaries of Atticus, has assured us : it was after the end of the first Punic war, the year before Ennius was born. Dacier has not carried the matter altogether thus far ; he only says, 5 that one Livius Andronicus was the first stage-poet at Rome ; but I will adventure on this hint, to advance another proposition, which I hope the learned will approve. And though we have not anything of Andronicus remaining to justify my conjecture, yet 10 it is exceeding probable, that, having read the works of those Grecian wits, his countrymen, he imitated not only the groundwork, but also the manner of their writing ; and how grave soever his tragedies might be, yet, in his comedies, he expressed the way of 15 Aristophanes, Eupolis, and the rest, which was to call some persons by their own names, and to expose their defects to the laughter of the people : the examples of which we have in the forementioned Aristophanes, who turned the wise Socrates into ridicule, and is also 20 very free with the management of Cleon, Alcibiades, and other ministers of the Athenian government. Now, if this be granted, we may easily suppose that the first hint of satirical plays on the Roman stage was given by the Greeks : not from their Satyrica, for that has 25 been reasonably exploded in the former part of this discourse ; but from their Old Comedy, which was imitated first by Livius Andronicus. And then Quintilian and Horace must be cautiously interpreted, where they affirm that Satire is wholly Roman, and a sort of verse, 30 which was not touched on by the Grecians. The reconciliation of my opinion to the standard of their judgment is not, however, very difficult, since they spoke of Satire, not as in its first elements, but as it was formed into a separate work ; begun by Ennius, pursued 35 by Lucilius, and completed afterwards by Horace. The proof depends only on this postulatum, that the comedies of Andronicus, which were imitations of the Greek, were also imitations of their railleries, and reflections on particular persons. For, if this be granted me, which is a most probable supposition, 'tis easy to infer that 5 the first light which was given to the Roman theatrical satire was from the plays of Livius Andronicus; which will be more manifestly discovered when I come to speak of Ennius. In the meantime I will return to Dacier.

The people, says he, ran in crowds to these new 10 entertainments of Andronicus, as to pieces which were more noble in their kind, and more perfect than their former satires, which for some time they neglected and abandoned. But not long after, they took them up again, and then they joined them to their comedies; 15 playing them at the end of every drama, as the French continue at this day to act their farces, in the nature of a separate entertainment from their tragedies. But more particularly they were joined to the Atellane fables, says Casaubon; which were plays invented by the Osci. 20 Those fables, says Valerius Maximus, out of Livy, were tempered with the Italian severity, and free from any note of infamy, or obscenity; and, as an old commentator of Juvenal affirms, the Exodiarii, which were singers and dancers, entered to entertain the people 25 with light songs, and mimical gestures, that they might not go away oppressed with melancholy, from those serious pieces of the theatre. So that the ancient Satire of the Romans was in extemporary reproaches; the next was farce, which was brought from Tuscany; 30 to that succeeded the plays of Andronicus, from the Old Comedy of the Grecians; and out of all these sprung two several branches of new Roman Satire, like different scions from the same root, which I shall prove with as much brevity as the subject will allow. 35

A year after Andronicus had opened the Roman stage with his new dramas, Ennius was born ; who, when he was grown to man's estate, having seriously considered the genius of the people, and how eagerly they followed 5 the first satires, thought it would be worth his pains to refine upon the project, and to write satires, not to be acted on the theatre, but read. He preserved the groundwork of their pleasantry, their venom, and their
10 raillery on particular persons, and general vices ; and by this means, avoiding the danger of any ill success in a public representation, he hoped to be as well received in the cabinet, as Andronicus had been upon the stage. The event was answerable to his expectation. He made discourses in several sorts of verse, varied often
15 in the same paper ; retaining still in the title their original name of Satire. Both in relation to the subjects, and the variety of matters contained in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them ; only Ennius, as I have said, confines not himself to one
20 sort of verse, as Horace does ; but taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of Satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the licence, when one sort of numbers comes not easily, to run into another, as his 25 fancy dictates. For he makes no difficulty to mingle hexameter with iambic trimeters, or with trochaic tetrameters ; as appears by those fragments which are yet remaining of him. Horace has thought him worthy to be copied ; inserting many things of his into his own 30 Satires, as Virgil has done into his Æneids.

Here we have Dacier making out that Ennius was the first satirist in that way of writing, which was of his invention ; that is, Satire abstracted from the stage, and new-modelled into papers of verses on several subjects.
35 But he will have Ennius take the groundwork of Satire from the first farces of the Romans, rather than from the formed plays of Livius Andronicus, which were copied from the Grecian comedies. It may possibly be so; but Dacier knows no more of it than I do. And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he rather 5 imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of his old countrymen, in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.

But besides this, it is universally granted, that Ennius, 10 though an Italian, was excellently learned in the Greek language. His verses were stuffed with fragments of it, even to a fault; and he himself believed, according to the Pythagorean opinion, that the soul of Homer was transfused into him; which Persius observes, in his 15 Sixth Satire: Postquam destertuit esse Mæonides. But this being only the private opinion of so inconsiderable a man as I am, I leave it to the further disquisition of the critics, if they think it worth their notice. Most evident it is, that whether he imitated the Roman farce, 20 or the Greek comedies, he is to be acknowledged for the first author of Roman Satire, as it is properly so called, and distinguished from any sort of stage-play.

Of Pacuvius, who succeeded him, there is little to be said, because there is so little remaining of him; only 25 that he is taken to be the nephew of Ennius, his sister's son; that in probability he was instructed by his uncle, in his way of satire, which we are told he has copied: but what advances he made we know not.

Lucilius came into the world when Pacuvius flourished 30 most. He also made satires after the manner of Ennius, but he gave them a more graceful turn, and endeavoured to imitate more closely the vetus comædia of the Greeks, of the which the old original Roman Satire had no idea, till the time of Livius Andronicus. And though Horace 35 seems to have made Lucilius the first author of satire in verse amongst the Romans, in these words—

... Quid? cum est Lucilius ausus
Primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem,—

5 he is only thus to be understood; that Lucilius had given a more graceful turn to the satire of Ennius and Pacuvius, not that he invented a new satire of his own: and Quintilian seems to explain this passage of Horace in these words: Satira quidem tota nostra est; in qua
 10 primus insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius.

Thus, both Horace and Quintilian give a kind of primacy of honour to Lucilius, amongst the Latin satirists. For, as the Roman language grew more refined, so much more capable it was of receiving the 15 Grecian beauties, in his time. Horace and Quintilian could mean no more, than that Lucilius writ better than Ennius and Pacuvius; and on the same account we prefer Horace to Lucilius. Both of them imitated the old Greek Comedy; and so did Ennius and Pacuvius
 20 before them. The polishing of the Latin tongue, in the succession of times, made the only difference; and Horace himself, in two of his satires, written purposely on this subject, thinks the Romans of his age were too partial in their commendations of Lucilius; who writ
 25 not only loosely, and muddily, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time when the Latin tongue was not yet sufficiently purged from the dregs of barbarism; and many significant and sounding words, which the Romans wanted, were not admitted even in the times
 30 of Lucretius and Cicero, of which both complain.

But to proceed:—Dacier justly taxes Casaubon, saying, that the Satires of Lucilius were wholly different in specie from those of Ennius and Pacuvius. Casaubon was led into that mistake by Diomedes the grammarian, who in effect says this : Satire amongst the Romans, but not amongst the Greeks, was a biting invective poem, made after the model of the ancient Comedy, for the reprehension of vices ; such as were the poems of Lucilius, of Horace, and of Persius. But in former 5 times the name of Satire was given to poems which were composed of several sorts of verses, such as were made by Ennius and Pacuvius ; more fully expressing the etymology of the word satire, from satura, which we have observed. Here 'tis manifest, that Diomedes 10 makes a specifical distinction betwixt the satires of Ennius, and those of Lucilius. But this, as we say in English, is only a distinction without a difference ; for the reason of it is ridiculous, and absolutely false. This was that which cozened honest Casaubon, who, relying 15 on Diomedes, had not sufficiently examined the origin and nature of those two satires ; which were entirely the same, both in the matter and the form : for all that Lucilius performed beyond his predecessors, Ennius and Pacuvius, was only the adding of more politeness, 20 and more salt, without any change in the substance of the poem. And though Lucilius put not together in the same satire several sorts of verses, as Ennius did, yet he composed several satires, of several sorts of verses, and mingled them with Greek verses : one poem 25 consisted only of hexameters, and another was entirely of iambics ; a third of trochaics ; as is visible by the fragments yet remaining of his works. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much 30 more of beauty and polishing to his own poems, than are to be found in those before him, it will follow from hence that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpassed Lucilius in the elegancy of his writing, than 35

Lucilius surpassed Ennius in the turn and ornament of his. This passage of Diomedes has also drawn Dousa, the son, into the same error of Casaubon, which I say, not to expose the little failings of those judicious men, 5 but only to make it appear, with how much diffidence and caution we are to read their works, when they treat a subject of so much obscurity, and so very ancient, as is this of Satire.

Having thus brought down the history of Satire from 10 its original to the times of Horace, and shown the several changes of it, I should here discover some of those graces which Horace added to it, but that I think it will be more proper to defer that undertaking, till I make the comparison betwixt him and Juvenal. In 15 the meanwhile, following the order of time, it will be necessary to say somewhat of another kind of Satire, which also was descended from the ancients; 'tis that which we call the Varronian Satire, (but which Varro himself calls the Menippean,) because Varro, the most 20 learned of the Romans, was the first author of it, who imitated, in his works, the manner of Menippus the Gadarenian, who professed the philosophy of the Cynics.

This sort of Satire was not only composed of several 25 sorts of verse, like those of Ennius, but was also mixed with prose; and Greek was sprinkled amongst the Latin. Quintilian, after he had spoken of the satire of Lucilius, adds what follows: There is another and former kind of satire, composed by Terentius Varro, the most learned of 30 the Romans; in which he was not satisfied alone with mingling in it several sorts of verse. The only difficulty of this passage is, that Quintilian tells us, that this satire of Varro was of a former kind. For how can we possibly imagine this to be, since Varro, who was 35 contemporary to Cicero, must consequently be after Lucilius? But Quintilian meant not, that the satire of Varro was in order of time before Lucilius; he would only give us to understand, that the Varronian Satire, with mixture of several sorts of verses, was more after the manner of Ennius and Pacuvius, than that of Lucilius, who was more severe, and more correct, and gave himself less liberty in the mixture of his verses in the same poem.

We have nothing remaining of those Varronian satires, excepting some inconsiderable fragments, and those for the most part much corrupted. The titles of many of them are indeed preserved, and they are generally double; from whence, at least, we may understand, how many various subjects were treated by that author. Tully, in his Academics, introduces Varro himself giving us some light concerning the scope and design of these works. Wherein, after he had shown his reasons why he did not ex professo write of philosophy, he adds what follows: Notwithstanding, says he, that those pieces of mine, wherein I have imitated Menippus, though I have not translated him, are sprinkled with a kind of mirth and gaiety, yet many things are there inserted, which are drawn from the very entrails of philosophy, and many things severely argued; which I have mingled with pleasantries on purpose, that they may more easily go down with the common sort of unlearned readers. The rest of the sentence is so lame, that we can only make thus much out of it, that in the composition of his satires he so tempered philology with philosophy, that his work was a mixture of them both. And Tully himself confirms us in this opinion, when a little after he addresses himself to Varro in these words: And you yourself have composed a most elegant and complete poem; you have begun philosophy in many places; sufficient to incite us, though too little to instruct us. Thus it appears, that Varro was one of those writers whom they called σπουδογέλοιοι, studious of laughter; and that, as learned as he was, his business was more to divert his reader, than to teach him. And he entitled his own 5 satires Menippean; not that Menippus had written any satires (for his were either dialogues or epistles), but that Varro imitated his style, his manner, and his facetiousness. All that we know further of Menippus and his writings, which are wholly lost, is, that by some he

 10 is esteemed, as, amongst the rest, by Varro; by others he is noted of cynical impudence, and obscenity: that he was much given to those parodies, which I have already mentioned; that is, he often quoted the verses of Homer and the tragic poets, and turned their serious
 15 meaning into something that was ridiculous; whereas Varro's satires are by Tully called absolute, and most elegant and various poems. Lucian, who was emulous of this Menippus, seems to have imitated both his manners and his style in many of his dialogues; where 20 Menippus himself is often introduced as a speaker in them, and as a perpetual buffoon; particularly his character is expressed in the beginning of that dialogue which is called Νεκρομαντεία. But Varro, in imitating him, avoids his impudence and filthiness, and only expresses 25 his witty pleasantry.

This we may believe for certain, that as his subjects were various, so most of them were tales or stories of his own invention. Which is also manifest from antiquity, by those authors who are acknowledged to have 30 written Varronian satires, in imitation of his; of whom the chief is Petronius Arbiter, whose satire, they say, is now printed in Holland, wholly recovered, and made complete: when 'tis made public, it will easily be seen by any one sentence, whether it be supposititious, or 35 genuine. Many of Lucian's dialogues may also properly be called Varronian satires, particularly his True History; and consequently the Golden Ass of Apuleius, which is taken from him. Of the same stamp is the mock deification of Claudius, by Seneca: and the Symposium or Cæsars of Julian, the Emperor. Amongst the moderns, we may reckon the Encomium Moræ of Erasmus, Barclay's Euphormio, and a volume of German authors, which my ingenious friend, Mr. Charles Killigrew, once lent me. In the English, I remember none which are mixed with prose, as Varro's were; but of the same kind is Mother Hubbard's Tale, in Spenser; and (if it be not too vain to mention anything of my own), the poems of Absalom and MacFleckno.

This is what I have to say in general of Satire: only, as Dacier has observed before me, we may take notice, that the word satire is of a more general signification in Latin, than in French, or English. For amongst the Romans it was not only used for those discourses which decried vice, or exposed folly, but for others also, where virtue was recommended. But in our modern languages we apply it only to invective poems, where the very name of Satire is formidable to those persons who would appear to the world what they are not in themselves; for in English, to say satire, is to mean reflection, as we use that word in the worst sense; or as the French call it, more properly, médiance. In the criticism of spelling, it ought to be with i, and not with y, to distinguish its true derivation from satura, not from satyrus. And if this be so, then it is false spelled throughout this book; for here it is written Satyr: which having not considered at the first, I thought it not worth correcting afterwards. But the French are more nice, and never spell it any other way than satire.

I am now arrived at the most difficult part of my undertaking, which is, to compare Horace with Juvenal and Persius. It is observed by Rigaltius, in his preface before Juvenal, written to Thuanus, that these three poets have all their particular partisans, and favourers.

5 Every commentator, as he has taken pains with any of them, thinks himself obliged to prefer his author to the other two; to find out their failings, and decry them, that he may make room for his own darling. Such is the partiality of mankind, to set up that interest which

10 they have once espoused, though it be to the prejudice of truth, morality, and common justice; and especially in the productions of the brain. As authors generally think themselves the best poets, because they cannot go out of themselves to judge sincerely of their betters;

15 so it is with critics, who, having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and to illustrate him; after which, they fall in love with their own labours, to that degree of blind fondness, that at length they defend and exalt their author, not so much

20 for his sake as for their own. 'Tis a folly of the same nature with that of the Romans themselves, in the games of the Circus. The spectators were divided in their factions, betwixt the Veneti and the Prasini; some were for the charioteer in blue, and some for him in

25 green. The colours themselves were but a fancy; but when once a man had taken pains to set out those of his party, and had been at the trouble of procuring voices for them, the case was altered; he was concerned for his own labour, and that so earnestly, that disputes

30 and quarrels, animosities, commotions, and bloodshed, often happened; and in the declension of the Grecian Empire the very sovereigns themselves engaged in it, even when the barbarians were at their doors, and stickled for the preference of colours, when the safety

35 of their people was in question. I am now myself on the brink of the same precipice; I have spent some time on the translation of Juvenal and Persius; and it behoves me to be wary, lest, for that reason, I should be partial to them, or take a prejudice against Horace. Yet, on the other side, I would not be like some of our 5 judges, who would give the cause for a poor man, right or wrong; for, though that be an error on the better hand, yet it is still a partiality: and a rich man, unheard, cannot be concluded an oppressor. I remember a saying of King Charles II on Sir Matthew Hale, (who was 10 doubtless an uncorrupt and upright man,) that his servants were sure to be cast on any trial which was heard before him; not that he thought the judge was possibly to be bribed, but that his integrity might be too scrupulous; and that the causes of the crown were always 15 suspicious, when the privileges of subjects were concerned. It had been much fairer, if the modern critics, who have embarked in the quarrels of their favourite authors, had rather given to each his proper due; without taking from another's heap, to raise their own. 20 There is praise enough for each of them in particular, without encroaching on his fellows, and detracting from them, or enriching themselves with the spoils of others. But to come to particulars. Heinsius and Dacier are the most principal of those who raise Horace above 25 Juvenal and Persius. Scaliger the father, Rigaltius, and many others, debase Horace, that they may set up Juvenal; and Casaubon, who is almost single, throws dirt on Juvenal and Horace, that he may exalt Persius, whom he understood particularly well, and better than 30 any of his former commentators; even Stelluti, who succeeded him. I will begin with him, who, in my opinion, defends the weakest cause, which is that of Persius; and labouring, as Tacitus professes of his own writing, to divest myself of partiality, or prejudice, con- 35

sider Persius, not as a poet whom I have wholly translated, and who has cost me more labour and time than Juvenal, but according to what I judge to be his own merit; which I think not equal, in the main, to 5 that of Juvenal or Horace, and yet in some things to be preferred to both of them.

First, then, for the verse; neither Casaubon himself, nor any for him, can defend either his numbers, or the purity of his Latin. Casaubon gives this point for lost, 10 and pretends not to justify either the measures or the words of Persius; he is evidently beneath Horace and Juvenal in both.

Then, as his verse is scabrous, and hobbling, and his words not everywhere well chosen, the purity of Latin 15 being more corrupted than in the time of Juvenal, and consequently of Horace, who writ when the language was in the height of its perfection, so his diction is hard, his figures are generally too bold and daring, and his tropes, particularly his metaphors, insufferably strained.
20 In the third place, notwithstanding all the diligence of Casaubon, Stelluti, and a Scotch gentleman, whom I have heard extremely commended for his illustrations of him, yet he is still obscure: whether he affected not to be understood, but with difficulty; or whether the 25 fear of his safety under Nero compelled him to this darkness in some places; or that it was occasioned by his close way of thinking, and the brevity of his style, and crowding of his figures; or lastly, whether, after so long a time, many of his words have been corrupted, 30 and many customs, and stories relating to them, lost to us: whether some of these reasons, or all, concurred to render him so cloudy, we may be bold to affirm, that the best of commentators can but guess at his meaning, in many passages; and none can be certain that he has 35 divined rightly.

After all, he was a young man, like his friend and contemporary Lucan; both of them men of extraordinary parts, and great acquired knowledge, considering their youth: but neither of them had arrived to that maturity of judgment which is necessary to the accomplishing of a formed poet. And this consideration, as, on the one hand, it lays some imperfections to their charge, so, on the other side, 'tis a candid excuse for those failings which are incident to youth and inexperience; and we have more reason to wonder how they, who died before the thirtieth year of their age, could write so well, and think so strongly, than to accuse them of those faults from which human nature, and more especially in youth, can never possibly be exempted.

To consider Persius yet more closely: he rather insulted over vice and folly, than exposed them, like Juvenal and Horace; and as chaste and modest as he is esteemed, it cannot be denied, but that in some places he is broad and fulsome, as the latter verses of the Fourth Satire, and of the Sixth, sufficiently witness. And 'tis to be believed that he who commits the same crime often, and without necessity, cannot but do it with some kind of pleasure.

To come to a conclusion: he is manifestly below Horace, because he borrows most of his greatest beauties from him; and Casaubon is so far from denying this, that he has written a treatise purposely concerning it, wherein he shows a multitude of his translations from Horace, and his imitations of him, for the credit of his author; which he calls Imitatio Horatiana.

To these defects, which I casually observed while I was translating this author, Scaliger has added others; he calls him, in plain terms, a silly writer, and a trifler, full of ostentation of his learning, and, after all, unworthy to come into competition with Juvenal and Horace.

After such terrible accusations, 'tis time to hear what his patron Casaubon can allege in his defence. Instead 5 of answering, he excuses for the most part ; and, when he cannot, accuses others of the same crimes. He deals with Scaliger, as a modest scholar with a master. He compliments him with so much reverence, that one would swear he feared him as much at least as he
 10 respected him. Scaliger will not allow Persius to have any wit ; Casaubon interprets this in the mildest sense, and confesses his author was not good at turning things into a pleasant ridicule ; or, in other words, that he was not a laughable writer. That he was ineptus, indeed, 15 but that was non aptissimus ad jocandum ; but that he was ostentatious of his learning, that, by Scaliger's good favour, he denies. Persius showed his learning, but was no boaster of it ; he did ostendere, but not ostentare ; and so, he says, did Scaliger : where, methinks,
 20 Casaubon turns it handsomely upon that supercilious critic, and silently insinuates that he himself was sufficiently vainglorious, and a boaster of his own knowledge. All the writings of this venerable censor, continues Casaubon, which are χρυσοῦ χρυσότερα, more 25 golden than gold itself, are everywhere smelling of that thyme which, like a bee, he has gathered from ancient authors ; but far be ostentation and vainglory from a gentleman so well born, and so nobly educated as Scaliger. But, says Scaliger, he is so obscure, 30 that he has got himself the name of Scotinus, a dark writer. Now, says Casaubon, it is a wonder to me that anything could be obscure to the divine wit of Scaliger, from which nothing could be hidden. This is indeed a strong compliment, but no defence ; and 35 Casaubon, who could not but be sensible of his author's blind side, thinks it time to abandon a post that was untenable. He acknowledges that Persius is obscure in some places; but so is Plato, so is Thucydides; so are Pindar, Theocritus, and Aristophanes, amongst the Greek poets; and even Horace and Juvenal, he might have added, amongst the Romans. The truth is, Persius is not sometimes, but generally, obscure; and therefore Casaubon, at last, is forced to excuse him, by alleging that it was se defendendo, for fear of Nero; and that he was commanded to write so cloudily by Cornutus, in virtue of holy obedience to his master. I cannot help my own opinion; I think Cornutus needed not to have read many lectures to him on that subject. Persius was an apt scholar; and when he was bidden to be obscure in some places, where his life and safety were in question, took the same counsel for all his books; and never afterwards wrote ten lines together clearly. Casaubon, being upon this chapter, has not failed, we may be sure, of making a compliment to his own dear comment. If Persius, says he, be in himself obscure, yet my interpretation has made him intelligible. There is no question but he deserves that praise which he has given to himself; but the nature of the thing, as Lucretius says, will not admit of a perfect explanation. Besides many examples, which I could urge, the very last verse of his last satire, upon which he particularly values himself in his preface, is not yet sufficiently explicated. 'Tis true, Holyday has endeavoured to justify his construction; but Stelluti is against it; and, for my part, I can have but a very dark notion of it. As for the chastity of his thoughts, Casaubon denies not but that one particular passage, in the Fourth Satire. At si unctus cesses, etc., is not only the most obscure, but the most obscene of all his works. I understood it; but for that reason turned it over. In defence of his boisterous metaphors, he quotes Longinus, who accounts them as instruments of the sublime ; fit to move and stir up the affections, particularly in narration. To which it may be replied, that where the 5 trope is far-fetched and hard it is fit for nothing but to puzzle the understanding ; and may be reckoned amongst those things of Demosthenes which Æschines called θαύματα, not ρήματα, that is, prodigies, not words. It must be granted to Casaubon, that the knowledge of 10 many things is lost in our modern ages, which were of familiar notice to the ancients ; and that Satire is a poem of a difficult nature in itself, and is not written to vulgar readers : and through the relation which it has to comedy, the frequent change of persons makes the 15 sense perplexed, when we can but divine who it is that speaks ; whether Persius himself, or his friend and monitor ; or, in some places, a third person. But Casaubon comes back always to himself, and concludes, that if Persius had not been obscure there had been 20 no need of him for an interpreter. Yet when he had once enjoined himself so hard a task, he then considered the Greek proverb, that he must χελώνης φαγείν ἢ μὴ φαγείν, either eat the whole snail, or let it quite alone ; and so he went through with his laborious task, as I 25 have done with my difficult translation.

Thus far, my Lord, you see it has gone very hard with Persius : I think he cannot be allowed to stand in competition either with Juvenal or Horace. Yet for once I will venture to be so vain as to affirm, that none 30 of his hard metaphors, or forced expressions, are in my translation. But more of this in its proper place, where I shall say somewhat in particular of our general performance, in making these two authors English. In the meantime, I think myself obliged to give Persius his 35 undoubted due, and to acquaint the world, with Casau-

bon, in what he has equalled, and in what excelled, his two competitors.

A man who has resolved to praise an author, with any appearance of justice, must be sure to take him on the strongest side, and where he is least liable to exceptions. He is therefore obliged to choose his mediums accordingly. Casaubon, who saw that Persius could not laugh with a becoming grace, that he was not made for jesting, and that a merry conceit was not his talent, turned his feather, like an Indian, to another light, that he might give it the better gloss. Moral doctrine, says he, and urbanity, or well-mannered wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire; but of the two, that which is most essential to this poem, and is, as it were, the very soul which animates it, is the scourging of vice, and exhortation to virtue. Thus wit, for a good reason, is already almost out of doors; and allowed only for an instrument, a kind of tool, or a weapon, as he calls it, of which the satirist makes use in the compassing of his design. The end and aim of our three rivals is consequently the same. But by what methods they have prosecuted their intention is further to be considered. Satire is of the nature of moral philosophy, as being instructive: he, therefore, who instructs most usefully, will carry the palm from his two antagonists. The philosophy in which Persius was educated, and which he professes through his whole book, is the Stoic; the most noble, most generous, most beneficial to human kind, amongst all the sects, who have given us the rules of ethics, thereby to form a severe virtue in the soul; to raise in us an undaunted courage against the assaults of fortune; to esteem as nothing the things that are without us, because they are not in our power; not to value riches, beauty, honours, fame, or health, any further than as conveniences, and so many helps to living as we ought, and doing good in our generation. In short, to be always happy, while we possess our minds with a good conscience, are free from the slavery of vices, and conform our actions and 5 conversations to the rules of right reason. See here, my Lord, an epitome of Epictetus ; the doctrine of Zeno, and the education of our Persius. And this he expressed, not only in all his satires, but in the manner of his life. I will not lessen this commendation of the 10 Stoic philosophy by giving you an account of some absurdities in their doctrine, and some perhaps impieties, if we consider them by the standard of Christian faith. Persius has fallen into none of them ; and therefore is free from those imputations. What he teaches 15 might be taught from pulpits, with more profit to the audience than all the nice speculations of divinity, and controversies concerning faith ; which are more for the profit of the shepherd than for the edification of the flock. Passions, interest, ambition, and all their bloody 20 consequences of discord and of war, are banished from this doctrine. Here is nothing proposed but the quiet and tranquillity of the mind ; virtue lodged at home, and afterwards diffused in her general effects, to the improvement and good of human kind. And therefore

25 I wonder not that the present Bishop of Salisbury has recommended this our author, and the Tenth Satire of Juvenal, in his Pastoral Letter, to the serious perusal and practice of the divines in his diocese, as the best common-places for their sermons, as the store-houses 30 and magazines of moral virtues, from whence they may draw out, as they have occasion, all manner of assistance for the accomplishment of a virtuous life, which the Stoics have assigned for the great end and perfection of mankind. Herein then it is, that Persius has 35 excelled both Juvenal and Horace. He sticks to his own philosophy; he shifts not sides, like Horace, who is sometimes an Epicurean, sometimes a Stoic, sometimes an Eclectic, as his present humour leads him; nor declaims like Juvenal against vices, more like an orator than a philosopher. Persius is everywhere the same; true to the dogmas of his master. What he has learnt, he teaches vehemently; and what he teaches, that he practises himself. There is a spirit of sincerity in all he says; you may easily discern that he is in earnest, and is persuaded of that truth which he inculcates. In this I am of opinion that he excels Horace, who is commonly in jest, and laughs while he instructs; and is equal to Juvenal, who was as honest and serious as Persius, and more he could not be.

Hitherto I have followed Casaubon, and enlarged upon him, because I am satisfied that he says no more than truth; the rest is almost all frivolous. For he says that Horace, being the son of a tax-gatherer, or a collector, as we call it, smells everywhere of the meanness of his birth and education: his conceits are vulgar, like the subjects of his satires; that he does plebeium sapere, and writes not with that elevation which becomes a satirist: that Persius, being nobly born, and of an opulent family, had likewise the advantage of a better master; Cornutus being the most learned of his time, a man of the most holy life, a chief of the Stoic sect at Rome, and not only a great philosopher, but a poet himself, and in probability a coadjutor of Persius: that, as for Juvenal, he was long a declaimer, came late to poetry, and has not been much conversant in philosophy.

'Tis granted that the father of Horace was libertinus, that is, one degree removed from his grandfather, who had been once a slave. But Horace, speaking of him, gives him the best character of a father which I ever read in history; and I wish a witty friend of mine, now 35

living, had such another. He bred him in the best school, and with the best company of young noblemen ; and Horace, by his gratitude to his memory, gives a certain testimony that his education was ingenuous. 5 After this, he formed himself abroad, by the conversation of great men. Brutus found him at Athens, and was so pleased with him, that he took him thence into the army, and made him tribunus militum, a colonel in a legion, which was the preferment of an old soldier. All this 10 was before his acquaintance with Mæcenas, and his introduction into the court of Augustus, and the familiarity of that great emperor ; which, had he not been well-bred before, had been enough to civilise his conversation, and render him accomplished and knowing in all the 15 arts of complacency and good behaviour ; and, in short, an agreeable companion for the retired hours and privacies of a favourite, who was first minister. So that, upon the whole matter, Persius may be acknowledged to be equal with him in those respects, though better 20 born, and Juvenal inferior to both. If the advantage be anywhere, 'tis on the side of Horace ; as much as the court of Augustus Cæsar was superior to that of Nero. As for the subjects which they treated, it will appear hereafter that Horace writ not vulgarly on vulgar sub- 25 jects, nor always chose them. His style is constantly accommodated to his subject, either high or low. If his fault be too much lowness, that of Persius is the fault of the hardness of his metaphors, and obscurity : and so they are equal in the failings of their style ; where 30 Juvenal manifestly triumphs over both of them.

The comparison betwixt Horace and Juvenal is more difficult ; because their forces were more equal. A dispute has always been, and ever will continue, betwixt the favourers of the two poets. Non nostrum est tantas 35 componere lites. I shall only venture to give my own opinion, and leave it for better judges to determine. If it be only argued in general, which of them was the better poet, the victory is already gained on the side of Horace. Virgil himself must yield to him in the delicacy of his turns, his choice of words, and perhaps 5 the purity of his Latin. He who says that Pindar is inimitable, is himself inimitable in his Odes. But the contention betwixt these two great masters is for the prize of Satire; in which controversy all the Odes and Epodes of Horace are to stand excluded. I say this, 10 because Horace has written many of them satirically, against his private enemies; yet these, if justly considered, are somewhat of the nature of the Greek Silli, which were invectives against particular sects and persons. But Horace had purged himself of this 15 choler before he entered on those discourses which are more properly called the Roman Satire. He has not now to do with a Lyce, a Canidia, a Cassius Severus, or a Menas; but is to correct the vices and the follies of his time, and to give the rules of a happy and virtuous 20 life. In a word, that former sort of satire, which is known in England by the name of lampoon, is a dangerous sort of weapon, and for the most part unlawful. We have no moral right on the reputation of other men. 'Tis taking from them what we cannot restore to them. There 25 are only two reasons for which we may be permitted to write lampoons; and I will not promise that they can always justify us. The first is revenge, when we have been affronted in the same nature, or have been any ways notoriously abused, and can make ourselves no 30 other reparation. And yet we know, that, in Christian charity, all offences are to be forgiven, as we expect the like pardon for those which we daily commit against Almighty God. And this consideration has often made me tremble when I was saying our Saviour's prayer; 35 for the plain condition of the forgiveness which we beg is the pardoning of others the offences which they have done to us ; for which reason I have many times avoided the commission of that fault, even when I have been 5 notoriously provoked. Let not this, my Lord, pass for vanity in me ; for it is truth. More libels have been written against me, than almost any man now living ; and I had reason on my side, to have defended my own innocence. I speak not of my poetry, which I have 10 wholly given up to the critics : let them use it as they please : posterity, perhaps, may be more favourable to me ; for interest and passion will lie buried in another age, and partiality and prejudice be forgotten. I speak of my morals, which have been sufficiently aspersed :

15 that only sort of reputation ought to be dear to every honest man, and is to me. But let the world witness for me, that I have been often wanting to myself in that particular ; I have seldom answered any scurrilous lampoon, when it was in my power to have exposed my 20 enemies : and, being naturally vindictive, have suffered in silence, and possessed my soul in quiet.

Anything, though never so little, which a man speaks of himself, in my opinion, is still too much ; and therefore I will waive this subject, and proceed to give the 25 second reason which may justify a poet when he writes against a particular person ; and that is, when he is become a public nuisance. All those, whom Horace in his Satires, and Persius and Juvenal have mentioned in theirs, with a brand of infamy, are wholly such. 'Tis an 30 action of virtue to make examples of vicious men. They may and ought to be upbraided with their crimes and follies ; both for their own amendment, if they are not yet incorrigible, and for the terror of others, to hinder them from falling into those enormities which they see 35 are so severely punished in the persons of others. The first reason was only an excuse for revenge ; but this second is absolutely of a poet's office to perform : but how few lampooners are there now living, who are capable of this duty ! When they come in my way, 'tis impossible sometimes to avoid reading them. But, good 5 God ! how remote they are, in common justice, from the choice of such persons as are the proper subject of satire ! And how little wit they bring for the support of their injustice ! The weaker sex is their most ordinary theme ; and the best and fairest are sure to be the most 10 severely handled. Amongst men, those who are prosperously unjust are entitled to a panegyric ; but afflicted virtue is insolently stabbed with all manner of reproaches. No decency is considered, no fulsomeness omitted ; no venom is wanting, as far as dulness can 15 supply it. For there is a perpetual dearth of wit ; a barrenness of good sense and entertainment. The neglect of the readers will soon put an end to this sort of scribbling. There can be no pleasantry where there is no wit ; no impression can be made where there is no truth 20 for the foundation. To conclude : they are like the fruits of the earth in this unnatural season ; the corn which held up its head is spoiled with rankness ; but the greater part of the harvest is laid along, and little of good income and wholesome nourishment is received into the barns. 25 This is almost a digression, I confess to your Lordship ; but a just indignation forced it from me. Now I have removed this rubbish, I will return to the comparison of Juvenal and Horace.

I would willingly divide the palm betwixt them, upon 30 the two heads of profit and delight, which are the two ends of poetry in general. It must be granted, by the favourers of Juvenal, that Horace is the more copious and profitable in his instructions of human life ; but, in my particular opinion, which I set not up for a standard 35 to better judgments, Juvenal is the more delightful author. I am profited by both, I am pleased with both ; but I owe more to Horace for my instruction, and more to Juvenal for my pleasure. This, as I said, is my particular taste of these two authors: they who will have either of them to excel the other in both qualities can scarce give better reasons for their opinion than I for mine. But all unbiassed readers will conclude, that my moderation is not to be condemned: to such impartial men I must appeal ; for they who have already formed their judgment may justly stand suspected of prejudice ; and though all who are my readers will set up to be my judges, I enter my caveat against them, that they ought not so much as to be of my jury ; or, if they be admitted, 'tis but reason that they should first hear what I have to urge in the defence of my opinion.

That Horace is somewhat the better instructor of the two, is proved from hence, that his instructions are more general, Juvenal's more limited. So that, granting that the counsels which they give are equally good for moral use, Horace, who gives the most various advice, and most applicable to all occasions which can occur to us in the course of our lives,—as including in his discourses, not only all the rules of morality, but also of civil conversation,—is undoubtedly to be preferred to him who is more circumscribed in his instructions, makes them to fewer people, and on fewer occasions, than the other. I may be pardoned for using an old saying, since 'tis true, and to the purpose : Bonum quo communius, eo melius. Juvenal, excepting only his First Satire, is in all the rest confined to the exposing of some particular vice ; that he lashes, and there he sticks. His sentences are truly shining and instructive ; but they are sprinkled here and there.

Horace is teaching us in every line, and is perpetually moral: he had found out the skill of Virgil, to hide his sentences; to give you the virtue of them, without showing them in their full extent; which is the ostentation of a poet, and not his art: and this Petronius charges 5 on the authors of his time, as a vice of writing which was then growing on the age: ne sententiæ extra corpus orationis emineant: he would have them weaved into the body of the work, and not appear embossed upon it, and striking directly on the reader's view. Folly 10 was the proper quarry, of Horace, and not vice; and as there are but few notoriously wicked men, in comparison with a shoal of fools and fops, so 'tis a harder thing to make a man wise than to make him honest; for the will is only to be reclaimed in the one, but the 15 understanding is to be informed in the other. There are blind sides and follies, even in the professors of moral philosophy; and there is not any one sect of them that Horace has not exposed: which, as it was not the design of Juvenal, who was wholly employed in lashing 20 vices, some of them the most enormous that can be imagined, so, perhaps, it was not so much his talent.

*Omne vaser vitium ridenti Flaccus amico
Tangit, et admissus circum præcordia ludit.*

This was the commendation which Persius gave him: 25 where, by vitium, he means those little vices which we call follies, the defects of human understanding, or, at most, the peccadillos of life, rather than the tragical vices, to which men are hurried by their unruly passions and exorbitant desires. But in the word omne, which 30 is universal, he concludes with me, that the divine wit of Horace left nothing untouched; that he entered into the inmost recesses of nature; found out the imperfections even of the most wise and grave, as well as of the common people; discovering, even in the great 35

Trebatius, to whom he addresses the First Satire, his hunting after business, and following the court, as well as in the persecutor Crispinus, his impertinence and importunity. 'Tis true, he exposes Crispinus openly, 5 as a common nuisance; but he rallies the other, as a friend, more finely. The exhortations of Persius are confined to noblemen; and the Stoic philosophy is that alone which he recommends to them; Juvenal exhorts to particular virtues, as they are opposed to 10 those vices against which he declaims; but Horace laughs to shame all follies, and insinuates virtue rather by familiar examples than by the severity of precepts.

This last consideration seems to incline the balance on the side of Horace, and to give him the preference 15 to Juvenal, not only in profit, but in pleasure. But, after all, I must confess, that the delight which Horace gives me is but languishing. Be pleased still to understand, that I speak of my own taste only: he may ravish other men; but I am too stupid and insensible to be 20 tickled. Where he barely grins himself, and, as Scaliger says, only shows his white teeth, he cannot provoke me to any laughter. His urbanity, that is, his good manners, are to be commended, but his wit is faint; and his salt, if I may dare to say so, almost insipid. Juvenal is of 25 a more vigorous and masculine wit; he gives me as much pleasure as I can bear; he fully satisfies my expectation; he treats his subject home: his spleen is raised, and he raises mine: I have the pleasure of concernment in all he says; he drives his reader along 30 with him; and when he is at the end of his way I willingly stop with him. If he went another stage, it would be too far; it would make a journey of a progress, and turn delight into fatigue. When he gives over, it is a sign the subject is exhausted, and the wit 35 of man can carry it no further. If a fault can be justly found in him, 'tis that he is sometimes too luxuriant, too redundant; says more than he needs, like my friend the Plain-Dealer, but never more than pleases. Add to this, that his thoughts are as just as those of Horace, and much more elevated. His expressions 5 are sonorous and more noble; his verse more numerous, and his words are suitable to his thoughts, sublime and lofty. All these contribute to the pleasure of the reader; and the greater the soul of him who reads, his transports are the greater. Horace is always on the amble, 10 Juvenal on the gallop, but his way is perpetually on carpet-ground. He goes with more impetuosity than Horace, but as securely; and the swiftness adds a more lively agitation to the spirits. The low style of Horace is according to his subject, that is, generally 15 grovelling. I question not but he could have raised it; for the First Epistle of the Second Book, which he writes to Augustus, (a most instructive satire concerning poetry,) is of so much dignity in the words, and of so much elegance in the numbers, that the author plainly 20 shows the sermo pedestris, in his other Satires, was rather his choice than his necessity. He was a rival to Lucilius, his predecessor, and was resolved to surpass him in his own manner. Lucilius, as we see by his remaining fragments, minded neither his style, nor 25 his numbers, nor his purity of words, nor his run of verse. Horace therefore copes with him in that humble way of satire, writes under his own force, and carries a dead-weight, that he may match his competitor in the race. This, I imagine, was the chief reason why he 30 minded only the clearness of his satire, and the clearness of expression, without ascending to those heights to which his own vigour might have carried him. But, limiting his desires only to the conquest of Lucilius, he had his ends of his rival, who lived before him; but 35 made way for a new conquest over himself, by Juvenal, his successor. He could not give an equal pleasure to his reader, because he used not equal instruments. The fault was in the tools, and not in the workman. But 5 versification and numbers are the greatest pleasures of poetry: Virgil knew it, and practised both so happily, that, for aught I know, his greatest excellency is in his diction. In all other parts of poetry, he is faultless; but in this he placed his chief perfection. And 10 give me leave, my Lord, since I have here an apt occasion, to say that Virgil could have written sharper satires than either Horace or Juvenal, if he would have employed his talent that way. I will produce a verse and half of his, in one of his Eclogues, to justify my 15 opinion; and with commas after every word, to show that he has given almost as many lashes as he has written syllables. 'Tis against a bad poet, whose ill verses he describes:—

... non tu, in triviis, indocte, solebas

20

Stridenti, miserum, stipula disperdere carmen?

But to return to my purpose: when there is anything deficient in numbers and sound, the reader is uneasy and unsatisfied; he wants something of his complement, desires somewhat which he finds not: and this being 25 the manifest defect of Horace, 'tis no wonder that, finding it supplied in Juvenal, we are more delighted with him. And, besides this, the sauce of Juvenal is more poignant, to create in us an appetite of reading him. The meat of Horace is more nourishing; but the 30 cookery of Juvenal more exquisite: so that, granting Horace to be the more general philosopher, we cannot deny that Juvenal was the greater poet, I mean in satire. His thoughts are sharper; his indignation against vice is more vehement; his spirit has more of 35 the commonwealth genius; he treats tyranny, and all the vices attending it, as they deserve, with the utmost rigour: and consequently, a noble soul is better pleased with a zealous vindicator of Roman liberty, than with a temporising poet, a well-mannered court-slave, and a man who is often afraid of laughing in the right place; who is ever decent, because he is naturally servile. After all, Horace had the disadvantage of the times in which he lived; they were better for the man, but worse for the satirist. 'Tis generally said, that those enormous vices which were practised under the reign of Domitian were unknown in the time of Augustus Cæsar; that therefore Juvenal had a larger field than Horace. Little follies were out of doors when oppression was to be scourged instead of avarice: it was no longer time to turn into ridicule the false opinions of philosophers when the Roman liberty was to be asserted. There was more need of a Brutus in Domitian's days, to redeem or mend, than of a Horace, if he had then been living, to laugh at a fly-catcher. This reflection at the same time excuses Horace, but exalts Juvenal. I have ended, before I was aware, the comparison of Horace and Juvenal, upon the topics of instruction and delight; and, indeed, I may safely here conclude that common-place; for, if we make Horace our minister of state in Satire, and Juvenal of our private pleasures, I think the latter has no ill bargain of it. Let profit have the pre-eminence of honour, in the end of poetry. Pleasure, though but the second in degree, is the first in favour. And who would not choose to be loved better, rather than to be more esteemed? But I am entered already upon another topic, which concerns the particular merits of these two satirists. However, I will pursue my business where I left it, and carry it farther than that common observation of the several ages in which these authors flourished.

When Horace writ his Satires, the monarchy of his Cæsar was in its newness, and the government but just made easy to the conquered people. They could not possibly have forgotten the usurpation of that prince upon their freedom, nor the violent methods which he had used, in the compassing that vast design : they yet remembered his proscriptions, and the slaughter of so many noble Romans, their defenders : amongst the rest, that horrible action of his, when he forced Livia from the arms of her husband, who was constrained to see her married, as Dion relates the story, and, big with child as she was, conveyed to the bed of his insulting rival. The same Dion Cassius gives us another instance of the crime before mentioned ; that Cornelius Sisenna being reproached, in full senate, with the licentious conduct of his wife, returned this answer, that he had married her by the counsel of Augustus ; intimating, says my author, that Augustus had obliged him to that marriage, that he might, under that covert, have the more free access to her. His adulteries were still before their eyes : but they must be patient where they had not power. In other things that emperor was moderate enough : propriety was generally secured ; and the people entertained with public shows and donatives, to make them more easily digest their lost liberty. But Augustus, who was conscious to himself of so many crimes which he had committed, thought, in the first place, to provide for his own reputation, by making an edict against lampoons and satires, and the authors of those defamatory writings which my author Tacitus, from the law-term, calls famosos libellos.

In the first book of his Annals, he gives the following account of it, in these words : Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis, specie legis ejus, tractavit ; commotus Cassii Severi libidine, qua viros fœminasque illustres procacibus scriptis diffamaverat. Thus in English: 'Augustus was the first who under the colour of that law took cognisance of lampoons; being provoked to it by the petulancy of Cassius Severus, who had defamed many illustrious persons of both sexes in his writings.' 5 The law to which Tacitus refers was Lex læsæ Majestatis; commonly called, for the sake of brevity, Majestas; or, as we say, high treason. He means not, that this law had not been enacted formerly: for it had been made by the Decemviri, and was inscribed amongst the 10 rest in the Twelve Tables; to prevent the aspersion of the Roman majesty, either of the people themselves, or their religion, or their magistrates: and the infringement of it was capital; that is, the offender was whipt to death, with the fascēs, which were borne before their 15 chief officers of Rome. But Augustus was the first who restored that intermitted law. By the words, under colour of that law, he insinuates that Augustus caused it to be executed on pretence of those libels, which were written by Cassius Severus, against the 20 nobility; but, in truth, to save himself from such defamatory verses. Suetonius likewise makes mention of it thus: Sparsos de se in curia famosos libellos, nec expavit, et magna cura redarguit. Ac ne requisitis quidem auctoribus, id modo censuit, cognoscendum posthac de iis qui 25 libellos aut carmina ad infamiam cujuscpiam sub alieno nomine edant. 'Augustus was not afraid of libels,' says that author; 'yet he took all care imaginable to have them answered; and then decreed, that for the time to come the authors of them should be punished.' But 30 Aurelius makes it yet more clear, according to my sense, that this emperor for his own sake durst not permit them: Fecit id Augustus in speciem, ut quasi gratificaretur populo Romano, et primoribus urbis; sed revera ut sibi consuleret: nam habuit in animo, compri- 35 mere nimiam quorundam procacitatem in loquendo, a qua nec ipse exemptus fuit. Nam suo nomine compescere erat invidiosum, sub alieno facile et utile. Ergo specie legis tractavit, quasi populi Romani majestas infamaretur.

5 This, I think, is a sufficient comment on that passage of Tacitus. I will add only by the way, that the whole family of the Cæsars, and all their relations, were included in the law ; because the majesty of the Romans, in the time of the empire, was wholly in that 10 house ; omnia Cæsar erat : they were all accounted sacred who belonged to him. As for Cassius Severus, he was contemporary with Horace ; and was the same poet against whom he writes in his Epodes, under this title, In Cassium Severum maledicum poetam ; perhaps 15 intending to kill two crows, according to our proverb, with one stone, and revenge both himself and his emperor together.

From hence I may reasonably conclude, that Augustus, who was not altogether so good as he was wise, 20 had some by-respect in the enacting of this law ; for to do anything for nothing was not his maxim. Horace, as he was a courtier, complied with the interest of his master ; and, avoiding the lashing of greater crimes, confined himself to the ridiculing of petty vices and common follies ; excepting only some reserved cases, in his
5 Odes and Epodes, of his own particular quarrels, which either with permission of the magistrate, or without it, every man will revenge, though I say not that he should ; for prior læst is a good excuse in the civil law, if Chris-30 tianity had not taught us to forgive. However, he was not the proper man to arraign great vices, at least if the stories which we hear of him are true, that he practised some, which I will not here mention, out of honour to him. It was not for a Clodius to accuse adulterers, 35 especially when Augustus was of that number ; so that though his age was not exempted from the worst of villanies, there was no freedom left to reprehend them by reason of the edict; and our poet was not fit to represent them in an odious character, because himself was dipt in the same actions. Upon this account, without further insisting on the different tempers of Juvenal and Horace, I conclude, that the subjects which Horace chose for satire are of a lower nature than those of which Juvenal has written.

Thus I have treated, in a new method, the comparison betwixt Horace, Juvenal, and Persius; somewhat of their particular manner belonging to all of them is yet remaining to be considered. Persius was grave, and particularly opposed his gravity to lewdness, which was the predominant vice in Nero's court, at the time when he published his Satires, which was before that emperor fell into the excess of cruelty. Horace was a mild admonisher, a court-satirist, fit for the gentle times of Augustus, and more fit, for the reasons which I have already given. Juvenal was as proper for his times, as they for theirs; his was an age that deserved a more severe chastisement; vices were more gross and open, more flagitious, more encouraged by the example of a tyrant, and more protected by his authority. Therefore, wheresoever Juvenal mentions Nero, he means Domitian, whom he dares not attack in his own person, but scourges him by proxy. Heinsius urges in praise of Horace, that, according to the ancient art and law of satire, it should be nearer to comedy than tragedy; not declaiming against vice, but only laughing at it. Neither Persius nor Juvenal were ignorant of this, for they had both studied Horace. And the thing itself is plainly true. But as they had read Horace, they had likewise read Lucilius, of whom Persius says secuit urbem; . . . et genuinum fregit in illis ; meaning Mutius and Lupus ; and Juvenal also mentions him in these words : Ense velut stricto, quoties Lucilius ardens infremuit, &c. So that they thought the imitation of Lucilius was more proper to their purpose

5 than that of Horace. 'They changed satire' (says Holyday), 'but they changed it for the better ; for the business being to reform great vices, chastisement goes further than admonition ; whereas a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, does rather anger than amend a man.'

10 Thus far that learned critic, Barten Holyday, whose interpretation and illustrations of Juvenal are as excellent, as the verse of his translation and his English are lame and pitiful. For 'tis not enough to give us the meaning of a poet, which I acknowledge him to have 15 performed most faithfully, but he must also imitate his genius and his numbers, as far as the English will come up to the elegance of the original. In few words, 'tis only for a poet to translate a poem. Holyday and Stapylton had not enough considered this, when they 20 attempted Juvenal : but I forbear reflections ; only I beg leave to take notice of this sentence, where Holyday says, 'a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, rather angers than amends a man.' I cannot give him up the manner of Horace in low satire so easily. Let 25 the chastisement of Juvenal be never so necessary for his new kind of satire ; let him declaim as wittily and sharply as he pleases ; yet still the nicest and most delicate touches of satire consist in fine raillery. This, my Lord, is your particular talent, to which even 30 Juvenal could not arrive. 'Tis not reading, 'tis not imitation of an author, which can produce this fineness ; it must be inborn ; it must proceed from a genius, and particular way of thinking, which is not to be taught ; and therefore not to be imitated by him who has it not 35 from nature. How easy is it to call rogue and villain, and that wittily ! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a blockhead, or a knave, without using any of those opprobrious terms ! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing. This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice ; he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice. Neither is it true, that this fineness of raillery is offensive. A witty man is tickled while he is hurt in this manner, and a fool feels it not. The occasion of an offence may possibly be given, but he cannot take it. If it be granted, that in effect this way does more mischief ; that a man is secretly wounded, and though he be not sensible himself, yet the malicious world will find it out for him ; yet there is still a vast difference betwixt the slovenly butchering of a man, and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body, and leaves it standing in its place. A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging ; but to make a malefactor die sweetly was only belonging to her husband. I wish I could apply it to myself, if the reader would be kind enough to think it belongs to me. The character of Zimri in my Absalom is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem : it is not bloody, but it is ridiculous enough ; and he, for whom it was intended, was too witty to resent it as an injury. If I had railed, I might have suffered for it justly ; but I managed my own work more happily, perhaps more dexterously. I avoided the mention of great crimes, and applied myself to the representing of blindsides, and little extravagancies ; to which, the wittier a man is, he is generally the more obnoxious. It succeeded as I wished ; the jest went round, and he was laught at in his turn who began the frolic.

And thus, my Lord, you see I have preferred the manner of Horace, and of your Lordship, in this kind 5 of satire, to that of Juvenal, and, I think, reasonably. Holyday ought not to have arraigned so great an author, for that which was his excellency and his merit : or if he did, on such a palpable mistake, he might expect that some one might possibly arise, either in his 10 own time, or after him, to rectify his error, and restore to Horace that commendation of which he has so unjustly robbed him. And let the Manes of Juvenal forgive me if I say, that this way of Horace was the best for amending manners, as it is the most difficult.
15 His was an ense rescindendum ; but that of Horace was a pleasant cure, with all the limbs preserved entire ; and, as our mountebanks tell us in their bills, without keeping the patient within-doors for a day. What they promise only, Horace has effectually performed : yet I
20 contradict not the proposition which I formerly advanced. Juvenal's times required a more painful kind of operation ; but if he had lived in the age of Horace, I must needs affirm, that he had it not about him. He took the method which was prescribed him by his own 25 genius, which was sharp and eager ; he could not rally, but he could declaim ; and as his provocations were great, he has revenged them tragically. This notwithstanding, I am to say another word, which, as true as it is, will yet displease the partial admirers of our 30 Horace. I have hinted it before, but it is time for me now to speak more plainly.

This manner of Horace is indeed the best ; but Horace has not executed it altogether so happily, at least not often. The manner of Juvenal is confessed to 35 be inferior to the former, but Juvenal has excelled him in his performance. Juvenal has railed more wittily than Horace has rallied. Horace means to make his readers laugh, but he is not sure of his experiment. Juvenal always intends to move your indignation, and he always brings about his purpose. Horace, for aught I know, might have tickled the people of his age; but amongst the moderns he is not so successful. They who say he entertains so pleasantly may perhaps value themselves on the quickness of their own understandings, that they can see a jest further off than other men. They may find occasion of laughter in the wit-battle of the two buffoons, Sarmentus and Cicerrus; and hold their sides for fear of bursting, when Rupilius and Persius are scolding. For my own part, I can only like the characters of all four, which are judiciously given; but for my heart I cannot so much as smile at their insipid raillery. I see not why Persius should call upon Brutus to revenge him on his adversary; and that because he had killed Julius Cæsar, for endeavouring to be a king, therefore he should be desired to murder Rupilius, only because his name was Mr. King. A miserable clench, in my opinion, for Horace to record: I have heard honest Mr. Swan make many a better, and yet have had the grace to hold my countenance. But it may be puns were then in fashion, as they were wit in the sermons of the last age, and in the court of King Charles the Second. I am sorry to say it, for the sake of Horace; but certain it is, he has no fine palate who can feed so heartily on garbage.

But I have already wearied myself, and doubt not but I have tired your Lordship's patience, with this long, rambling, and, I fear, trivial discourse. Upon the one half of the merits, that is, pleasure, I cannot but conclude that Juvenal was the better satirist. They, who will descend into his particular praises, may find them at large in the Dissertation of the learned Rigaltius to Thuanus. As for Persius, I have given the reasons why I think him inferior to both of them; yet I have one thing to add on that subject.

5 Barten Holyday, who translated both Juvenal and Persius, has made this distinction betwixt them, which is no less true than witty; that in Persius the difficulty is to find a meaning, in Juvenal to choose a meaning: so crabbed is Persius, and so copious is Juvenal; so 10 much the understanding is employed in one, and so much the judgment in the other; so difficult it is to find any sense in the former, and the best sense of the latter.

If, on the other side, any one suppose I have commended Horace below his merit, when I have allowed 15 him but the second place, I desire him to consider, if Juvenal, a man of excellent natural endowments, besides the advantages of diligence and study, and coming after him, and building upon his foundations, might not probably, with all these helps, surpass him; and whether 20 it be any dishonour to Horace to be thus surpassed, since no art or science is at once begun and perfected, but that it must pass first through many hands, and even through several ages. If Lucilius could add to Ennius, and Horace to Lucilius, why, without any 25 diminution to the fame of Horace, might not Juvenal give the last perfection to that work? Or rather, what disreputation is it to Horace, that Juvenal excels in the tragical satire, as Horace does in the comical? I have read over attentively both Heinsius and Dacier, in 30 their commendations of Horace; but I can find no more in either of them, for the preference of him to Juvenal, than the instructive part; the part of wisdom, and not that of pleasure; which, therefore, is here allowed him, notwithstanding what Scaliger and Rigal-35 tius have pleaded to the contrary for Juvenal. And to show I am impartial, I will here translate what Dacier has said on that subject.

'I cannot give a more just idea of the two books of Satires made by Horace, than by comparing them to the statues of the Sileni, to which Alcibiades compares Socrates in the Symposium. They were figures, which had nothing of agreeable, nothing of beauty, on their outside; but when any one took the pains to open them, and search into them, he there found the figures of all the deities. So, in the shape that Horace presents himself to us in his Satires, we see nothing, at the first view, which deserves our attention. It seems that he is rather an amusement for children, than for the serious consideration of men. But, when we take away his crust, and that which hides him from our sight, when we discover him to the bottom, then we find all the divinities in a full assembly; that is to say, all the virtues which ought to be the continual exercise of those, who seriously endeavour to correct their vices.'

'Tis easy to observe, that Dacier, in this noble similitude, has confined the praise of his author wholly to the instructive part; the commendation turns on this, and so does that which follows.

'In these two books of Satire, 'tis the business of Horace to instruct us how to combat our vices, to regulate our passions, to follow nature, to give bounds to our desires, to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and betwixt our conceptions of things, and things themselves; to come back from our prejudicate opinions, to understand exactly the principles and motives of all our actions; and to avoid the ridicule into which all men necessarily fall, who are intoxicated with those notions which they have received from their masters, and which they obstinately retain, without examining whether or no they be founded on right reason.

‘In a word, he labours to render us happy in relation to ourselves ; agreeable and faithful to our friends ; and discreet, serviceable, and well-bred, in relation to those with whom we are obliged to live, and to converse.
 5 To make his figures intelligible, to conduct his readers through the labyrinth of some perplexed sentence, or obscure parenthesis, is no great matter ; and as Epictetus says, there is nothing of beauty in all this, or what is worthy of a prudent man. The principal business, 10 and which is of most importance to us, is to show the use, the reason, and the proof of his precepts.

‘They who endeavour not to correct themselves according to so exact a model, are just like the patients who have open before them a book of admirable receipts 15 for their diseases, and please themselves with reading it, without comprehending the nature of the remedies, or how to apply them to their cure.’

Let Horace go off with these encomiums, which he has so well deserved.

20 To conclude the contention betwixt our three poets, I will use the words of Virgil, in his fifth Æneid, where Æneas proposes the rewards of the foot-race to the three first who should reach the goal :—

25 *... tres præmia primi
 Accipient, flavaque caput nectentur oliva.*

Let these three ancients be preferred to all the moderns, as first arriving at the goal ; let them all be crowned, as victors, with the wreath that properly belongs to satire ; but, after that, with this distinction amongst themselves—

30 Primus equum phaleris insignem victor habeto :—

let Juvenal ride first in triumph ;

*Alter Amazoniam pharetram, plenamque sagittis
 Threicis, lato quam circumplectitur auro Balteus, et tereti subnectit fibula gemma :—*

let Horace, who is the second, and but just the second, carry off the quivers and the arrows, as the badges of his satire, and the golden belt, and the diamond button;

Tertius Argolico hoc clypeo contentus abito:—

and let Persius, the last of the first three worthies, be ⁵ contented with this Grecian shield, and with victory, not only over all the Grecians, who were ignorant of the Roman satire, but over all the moderns in succeeding ages, excepting Boileau and your Lordship.

And thus I have given the history of Satire, and ¹⁰ derived it as far as from Ennius to your Lordship; that is, from its first rudiments of barbarity to its last polishing and perfection; which is, with Virgil, in his address to Augustus—

... nomen fama tot ferre per annos,

Tithoni prima quot abest ab origine Cæsar.

15

I said only from Ennius; but I may safely carry it higher, as far as Livius Andronicus; who, as I have said formerly, taught the first play at Rome, in the year ab urbe condita DXIV. I have since desired my learned ²⁰ friend, Mr. Maidwell, to compute the difference of times betwixt Aristophanes and Livius Andronicus; and he assures me, from the best chronologers, that Plutus, the last of Aristophanes his plays, was represented at Athens in the year of the 97th Olympiad; ²⁵ which agrees with the year urbis conditæ CCCLXIV. So that the difference of years betwixt Aristophanes and Andronicus is 150; from whence I have probably deduced, that Livius Andronicus, who was a Grecian, had read the plays of the Old Comedy, which were ³⁰ satirical, and also of the New; for Menander was fifty years before him, which must needs be a great light to him in his own plays, that were of the satirical nature. That the Romans had farces before this, 'tis true; but then they had no communication with Greece; so that Andronicus was the first who wrote after the manner of the Old Comedy in his plays: he was imitated by Ennius, about thirty years afterwards. Though the former writ fables, the latter, speaking properly, began the Roman satire; according to that description, which Juvenal gives of it in his first:

Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas, Gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli.

- 10 This is that in which I have made bold to differ from Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and indeed from all the modern critics, that not Ennius, but Andronicus was the first who, by the Archæa Comædia of the Greeks, added many beauties to the first rude and barbarous 15 Roman satire: which sort of poem, though we had not derived from Rome, yet nature teaches it mankind in all ages, and in every country.

'Tis but necessary, that after so much has been said of Satire some definition of it should be given.

- 20 Heinsius, in his dissertations on Horace, makes it for me, in these words: 'Satire is a kind of poetry, without a series of action, invented for the purging of our minds; in which human vices, ignorance, and errors, and all things besides, which are produced from them 25 in every man, are severely reprehended; partly dramatically, partly simply, and sometimes in both kinds of speaking; but, for the most part, figuratively, and occultly; consisting in a low familiar way, chiefly in a sharp and pungent manner of speech; but partly,
30 also, in a facetious and civil way of jesting; by which either hatred, or laughter, or indignation, is moved.'—Where I cannot but observe, that this obscure and perplexed definition, or rather description, of satire, is wholly accommodated to the Horatian way; and excluding the works of Juvenal and Persius, as foreign from that kind of poem. The clause in the beginning of it without a series of action distinguishes satire properly from stage-plays, which are all of one action, and one continued series of action. The end or scope of 5 satire is to purge the passions; so far it is common to the satires of Juvenal and Persius. The rest which follows is also generally belonging to all three; till he comes upon us, with the excluding clause consisting in a low familiar way of speech, which is the proper character 10 of Horace; and from which the other two, for their honour be it spoken, are far distant. But how come lowness of style, and the familiarity of words, to be so much the propriety of satire, that without them a poet can be no more a satirist, than without risibility he can 15 be a man? Is the fault of Horace to be made the virtue and standing rule of this poem? Is the grande sophos of Persius, and the sublimity of Juvenal, to be circumscribed with the meanness of words and vulgarity of expression? If Horace refused the pains of num- 20 bers, and the loftiness of figures, are they bound to follow so ill a precedent? Let him walk afoot, with his pad in his hand, for his own pleasure; but let not them be accounted no poets, who choose to mount, and show their horsemanship. Holyday is not afraid to 25 say, that there was never such a fall, as from his Odes to his Satires, and that he, injuriously to himself, untuned his harp. The majestic way of Persius and Juvenal was new when they began it, but 'tis old to us; and what poems have not, with time, received an altera- 30 tion in their fashion? 'Which alteration,' says Holyday, 'is to aftertimes as good a warrant as the first.' Has not Virgil changed the manners of Homer's heroes in his Æneis? Certainly he has, and for the better: for Virgil's age was more civilised, and better bred; 35 and he writ according to the politeness of Rome, under the reign of Augustus Cæsar, not to the rudeness of Agamemnon's age, or the times of Homer. Why should we offer to confine free spirits to one form, 5 when we cannot so much as confine our bodies to one fashion of apparel? Would not Donne's Satires, which abound with so much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words, and of his numbers? But he followed Horace so very close, that of necessity he 10 must fall with him; and I may safely say it of this present age, that if we are not so great wits as Donne, yet certainly we are better poets.

But I have said enough, and it may be too much, on this subject. Will your Lordship be pleased to prolong 15 my audience, only so far, till I tell you my own trivial thoughts, how a modern satire should be made? I will not deviate in the least from the precepts and examples of the Ancients, who were always our best masters. I will only illustrate them, and discover some of the 20 hidden beauties in their designs, that we thereby may form our own in imitation of them. Will you please but to observe, that Persius, the least in dignity of all the three, has notwithstanding been the first who has discovered to us this important secret, in the design- 25 ing of a perfect satire; that it ought only to treat of one subject; to be confined to one particular theme; or at least, to one principally. If other vices occur in the management of the chief, they should only be transiently lashed, and not be insisted on, so as to make 30 the design double. As in a play of the English fashion, which we call a tragi-comedy, there is to be but one main design; and though there be an underplot, or second walk of comical characters and adventures, yet they are subservient to the chief fable, carried along 35 under it, and helping to it; so that the drama may not seem a monster with two heads. Thus, the Copernican system of the planets makes the moon to be moved by the motion of the earth, and carried about her orb, as a dependent of hers. Mascardi, in his discourse of the Doppia Favola, or double tale in plays, gives an instance 5 of it in the famous pastoral of Guarini, called Il Pastor Fido; where Corisca and the Satyr are the under parts; yet we may observe, that Corisca is brought into the body of the plot, and made subservient to it. 'Tis certain, that the divine wit of Horace was not ignorant 10 of this rule,—that a play, though it consists of many parts, must yet be one in the action, and must drive on the accomplishment of one design; for he gives this very precept, sit quodvis simplex duntaxat et unum; yet he seems not much to mind it in his Satires, many 15 of them consisting of more arguments than one; and the second without dependence on the first. Casaubon has observed this before me, in his preference of Persius to Horace; and will have his own beloved author to be the first who found out and introduced this 20 method of confining himself to one subject. I know it may be urged in defence of Horace, that this unity is not necessary; because the very word satura signifies a dish plentifully stored with all variety of fruit and grains. Yet Juvenal, who calls his poems a farrago, 25 which is a word of the same signification with satura, has chosen to follow the same method of Persius, and not of Horace; and Boileau, whose example alone is a sufficient authority, has wholly confined himself, in all his Satires, to this unity of design. That variety, 30 which is not to be found in any one satire, is, at least, in many, written on several occasions. And if variety be of absolute necessity in every one of them, according to the etymology of the word, yet it may arise naturally from one subject, as it is diversely treated, in the several 35 subordinate branches of it, all relating to the chief. It may be illustrated accordingly with variety of examples in the subdivisions of it, and with as many precepts as there are members of it; which, altogether, may complete that olla, or hotchpotch, which is properly a satire.

Under this unity of theme, or subject, is comprehended another rule for perfecting the design of true satire. The poet is bound, and that ex officio, to give his reader some one precept of moral virtue, and to caution him against some one-particular vice or folly. Other virtues, subordinate to the first, may be recommended under that chief head; and other vices or follies may be scourged, besides that which he principally intends. But he is chiefly to inculcate one virtue, and insist on that. Thus Juvenal, in every satire excepting the first, ties himself to one principal instructive point, or to the shunning of moral evil. Even in the Sixth, which seems only an arraignment of the whole sex of womankind, there is a latent admonition to avoid ill women, by showing how very few, who are virtuous and good, are to be found amongst them. But this, though the wittiest of all his satires, has yet the least of truth or instruction in it. He has run himself into his old declamatory way, and almost forgotten that he was now setting up for a moral poet.

Persius is never wanting to us in some profitable doctrine, and in exposing the opposite vices to it. His kind of philosophy is one, which is the Stoic; and every satire is a comment on one particular dogma of that sect, unless we will except the first, which is against bad writers; and yet even there he forgets not the precepts of the Porch. In general, all virtues are everywhere to be praised and recommended to practice; and all vices to be reprehended, and made either odious or ridiculous ; or else there is a fundamental error in the whole design.

I have already declared who are the only persons that are the adequate object of private satire, and who they are that may properly be exposed by name for public examples of vices and follies ; and therefore I will trouble your Lordship no further with them. Of the best and finest manner of Satire, I have said enough in the comparison betwixt Juvenal and Horace : 'tis that sharp, well-mannered way of laughing a folly out of countenance, of which your Lordship is the best master in this age. I will proceed to the versification, which is most proper for it, and add somewhat to what I have said already on that subject. The sort of verse which is called burlesque, consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. I ought to have mentioned him before, when I spoke of Donne ; but by a slip of an old man's memory he was forgotten. The worth of his poem is too well known to need my commendation, and he is above my censure. His satire is of the Varronian kind, though unmixed with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has managed it ; but in any other hand, the shortness of his verse, and the quick returns of rhyme, had debased the dignity of style. And besides, the double rhyme, (a necessary companion of burlesque writing,) is not so proper for manly satire ; for it turns earnest too much to jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain, to the best sort of readers : we are pleased ungratefully, and, if I may say so, against our liking. We thank him not for giving us that unseasonable delight, when we know he could have given us a better, and more solid. He might have left that task to others, who, not being able to put in thought, can only make us grin with the excrescence of a word of two or three syllables in the close. 'Tis, indeed, below so great a master to make 5 use of such a little instrument. But his good sense is perpetually shining through all he writes ; it affords us not the time of finding faults. We pass through the levity of his rhyme, and are immediately carried into some admirable useful thought. After all, he has 10 chosen this kind of verse, and has written the best in it : and had he taken another, he would always have excelled : as we say of a court favourite, that whatsoever his office be, he still makes it uppermost, and most beneficial to himself.

15 The quickness of your imagination, my Lord, has already prevented me ; and you know beforehand, that I would prefer the verse of ten syllables, which we call the English heroic, to that of eight. This is truly my opinion. For this sort of number is more roomy ; the 20 thought can turn itself with greater ease in a larger compass. When the rhyme comes too thick upon us, it straitens the expression ; we are thinking of the close, when we should be employed in adorning the thought. It makes a poet giddy with turning in a space too
25 narrow for his imagination ; he loses many beauties, without gaining one advantage. For a burlesque rhyme I have already concluded to be none ; or, if it were, 'tis more easily purchased in ten syllables than in eight. In both occasions 'tis as in a tennis-court, when 30 the strokes of greater force are given, when we strike out and play at length. Tassoni and Boileau have left us the best examples of this way, in the Secchia Rapita, and the Lutrin ; and next them Merlin Coccaius in his Baldus. I will speak only of the two former, because 35 the last is written in Latin verse. The Secchia Rapita is an Italian poem, a satire of the Varronian kind. 'Tis written in the stanza of eight, which is their measure for heroic verse. The words are stately, the numbers smooth, the turn both of thoughts and words is happy. The first six lines of the stanza seem majestic and 5 severe; but the two last turn them all into a pleasant ridicule. Boileau, if I am not much deceived, has modelled from hence his famous Lutrin. He had read the burlesque poetry of Scarron, with some kind of indignation, as witty as it was, and found nothing in 10 France that was worthy of his imitation; but he copied the Italian so well, that his own may pass for an original. He writes it in the French heroic verse, and calls it an heroic poem; his subject is trivial, but his verse is noble. I doubt not but he had Virgil in his 15 eye, for we find many admirable imitations of him, and some parodies; as particularly this passage in the fourth of the Æneids—

Nec tibi diva parens, generis nec Dardanus auctor, Perfide; sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens 20
Caucasus; Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera tigres:

which he thus translates, keeping to the words, but altering the sense—

*Non, ton Père à Paris, ne fut point boulanger:
Et tu n'es point du sang de Gervais, l'horloger;
Ta mère ne fut point la maitresse d'un coche:* 25
*Caucase dans ses flancs te forma d'une roche:
Une tigresse affreuse, en quelque antre écarté,
Te fit, avec son lait, sucer sa cruauté.*

And, as Virgil in his fourth Georgic, of the Bees, perpetually raises the lowness of his subject, by the loftiness of his words, and ennobles it by comparisons drawn from empires, and from monarchs—

Admiranda tibi levium spectacula rerum, Magnanimosque duces, totiusque ordine gentis 35
Mores et studia, et populos, et prælia dicam.

And again—

At genus immortale manet; multosque per annos

Stat fortuna domus, et avi numerantur avorum;—

we see Boileau pursuing him in the same flights, and 5 scarcely yielding to his master. This, I think, my Lord, to be the most beautiful, and most noble kind of satire. Here is the majesty of the heroic, finely mixed with the venom of the other; and raising the delight which otherwise would be flat and vulgar, by the 10 sublimity of the expression. I could say somewhat more of the delicacy of this and some other of his satires; but it might turn to his prejudice, if 'twere carried back to France.

I have given your Lordship but this bare hint, in what 15 verse and in what manner this sort of satire may be best managed. Had I time, I could enlarge on the beautiful turns of words and thoughts, which are as requisite in this, as in heroic poetry itself, of which the satire is undoubtedly a species. With these beautiful turns, 20 I confess myself to have been unacquainted, till about twenty years ago, in a conversation which I had with that noble wit of Scotland, Sir George Mackenzie, he asked me why I did not imitate in my verses the turns of Mr. Waller and Sir John Denham, of which he 25 repeated many to me. I had often read with pleasure, and with some profit, those two fathers of our English poetry, but had not seriously enough considered those beauties which gave the last perfection to their works.
 Some sprinklings of this kind I had also formerly in my 30 plays; but they were casual, and not designed. But this hint, thus seasonably given me, first made me sensible of my own wants, and brought me afterwards to seek for the supply of them in other English authors.

I looked over the darling of my youth, the famous 35 Cowley; there I found, instead of them, the points of wit, and quirks of epigram, even in the Davideis, an heroic poem, which is of an opposite nature to those puerilities; but no elegant turns either on the word or on the thought. Then I consulted a greater genius, (without offence to the Manes of that noble author,) 5 I mean Milton. But as he endeavours everywhere to express Homer, whose age had not arrived to that fineness, I found in him a true sublimity, lofty thoughts, which were clothed with admirable Grecisms, and ancient words, which he had been digging from the 10 mines of Chaucer and Spenser, and which, with all their rusticity, had somewhat of venerable in them; but I found not there neither that for which I looked. At last I had recourse to his master, Spenser, the author of that immortal poem called the Fairy Queen; and 15 there I met with that which I had been looking for so long in vain. Spenser had studied Virgil to as much advantage as Milton had done Homer; and amongst the rest of his excellencies had copied that. Looking farther into the Italian, I found Tasso had done the 20 same; nay more, that all the sonnets in that language are on the turn of the first thought; which Mr. Walsh, in his late ingenious preface to his poems, has observed. In short, Virgil and Ovid are the two principal fountains of them in Latin poetry. And the French at this day 25 are so fond of them, that they judge them to be the first beauties: delicat et bien tourné, are the highest commendations which they bestow on somewhat which they think a masterpiece.

An example of the turn on words, amongst a 30 thousand others, is that in the last book of Ovid's Metamorphoses— *Heu! quantum scelus est, in viscera, viscera condi!

Congestoque avidum pinguescere corpore corpus;
Alteriusque animantem animantis vivere leto.*

An example on the turn both of thoughts and words is to be found in Catullus, in the complaint of Ariadne, when she was left by Theseus—

5 *Tum jam nulla viro juranti femina credat ;
Nulla viri speret sermones esse fideles ;
Qui, dum aliquid cupiens animus prægestit apisci,
Nil metuunt jurare, nihil promittere parcunt :
Sed simul ac cupidæ mentis satiata libido est,
Dicta nihil metuere, nihil perjurâ curant.*

10 An extraordinary turn upon the words is that in Ovid's Epistolæ Heroidum, of Sappho to Phaon—

Si, nisi quæ forma poterit te digna videri, Nulla futura tua est, nulla futura tua est.

Lastly, a turn, which I cannot say is absolutely on 15 words, for the thought turns with them, is in the fourth Georgic of Virgil, where Orpheus is to receive his wife from Hell, on express condition not to look on her till she was come on earth—

20 *Cum subita incautum dementia cepit amantem ;
Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere Manes.*

I will not burthen your Lordship with more of them ; for I write to a master who understands them better than myself. But I may safely conclude them to be great beauties. I might descend also to the mechanic
25 beauties of heroic verse ; but we have yet no English prosodia, not so much as a tolerable dictionary, or a grammar ; so that our language is in a manner barbarous ; and what government will encourage any one, or more, who are capable of refining it, I know 30 not : but nothing under a public expense can go through with it. And I rather fear a declination of the language, than hope an advancement of it in the present age.

inf. lang.

I am still speaking to you, my Lord, though, in all 35 probability, you are already out of hearing. Nothing, which my meanness can produce, is worthy of this long attention. But I am come to the last petition of Abraham; if there be ten righteous lines, in this vast Preface, spare it for their sake; and also spare the next city, because it is but a little one. 5

I would excuse the performance of this translation, if it were all my own; but the better, though not the greater part, being the work of some gentlemen, who have succeeded very happily in their undertaking, let their excellencies atone for my imperfections, and those 10 of my sons. I have perused some of the satires, which are done by other hands; and they seem to me as perfect in their kind, as anything I have seen in English verse. The common way which we have taken is not a literal translation, but a kind of paraphrase; or some- 15 what, which is yet more loose, betwixt a paraphrase and imitation. It was not possible for us, or any men, to have made it pleasant any other way. If rendering the exact sense of those authors, almost line for line, had been our business, Barten Holyday had done it 20 already to our hands: and by the help of his learned notes and illustrations not only of Juvenal and Persius, but what yet is more obscure, his own verses, might be understood.

But he wrote for fame, and wrote to scholars: we 25 write only for the pleasure and entertainment of those gentlemen and ladies, who, though they are not scholars, are not ignorant: persons of understanding and good sense, who, not having been conversant in the original, or at least not having made Latin verse so much their 30 business as to be critics in it, would be glad to find if the wit of our two great authors be answerable to their fame and reputation in the world. We have, therefore, endeavoured to give the public all the satisfaction we are able in this kind. 35

And if we are not altogether so faithful to our author, as our predecessors Holyday and Stapylton, yet we may challenge to ourselves this praise, that we shall be far more pleasing to our readers. We have followed
 5 our authors at greater distance, though not step by step, as they have done: for oftentimes they have gone so close, that they have trod on the heels of Juvenal and Persius, and hurt them by their too near approach. A noble author would not be pursued too close by a 10 translator. We lose his spirit, when we think to take his body. The grosser part remains with us, but the soul is flown away in some noble expression, or some delicate turn of words, or thought. Thus Holyday, who made this way his choice, seized the meaning of Juvenal;
 15 but the poetry has always escaped him.

They who will not grant me, that pleasure is one of the ends of poetry, but that it is only a means of compassing the only end, which is instruction, must yet allow, that, without the means of pleasure, the instruction is but a bare and dry philosophy: a crude preparation of morals, which we may have from Aristotle and Epictetus, with more profit than from any poet. Neither Holyday nor Stapylton have imitated Juvenal in the poetical part of him, his diction and his elocution. Nor 20 had they been poets, as neither of them were, yet, in the way they took, it was impossible for them to have succeeded in the poetic part.

The English verse, which we call heroic, consists of no more than ten syllables; the Latin hexameter sometimes rises to seventeen; as, for example, this verse in Virgil—Pulverulenta putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.

Here is the difference of no less than seven syllables in a line, betwixt the English and the Latin. Now the 35 medium of these is about fourteen syllables; because the dactyl is a more frequent foot in hexameters than the spondee. But Holyday, without considering that he wrote with the disadvantage of four syllables less in every verse, endeavours to make one of his lines to comprehend the sense of one of Juvenal's. According 5 to the falsity of the proposition was the success. He was forced to crowd his verse with ill-sounding monosyllables, of which our barbarous language affords him a wild plenty; and by that means he arrived at his pedantic end, which was to make a literal translation. 10 His verses have nothing of verse in them, but only the worst part of it, the rhyme; and that, into the bargain, is far from good. But, which is more intolerable, by cramming his ill-chosen, and worse-sounding monosyllables so close together, the very sense which he 15 endeavours to explain is become more obscure than that of his author; so that Holyday himself cannot be understood, without as large a commentary as that which he makes on his two authors. For my own part, I can make a shift to find the meaning of Juvenal without his 20 notes: but his translation is more difficult than his author. And I find beauties in the Latin to recompense my pains; but, in Holyday and Stapylton, my ears, in the first place, are mortally offended; and then their sense is so perplexed, that I return to the original, as the more 25 pleasing task, as well as the more easy.

This must be said for our translation, that, if we give not the whole sense of Juvenal, yet we give the most considerable part of it: we give it, in general, so clearly, that few notes are sufficient to make us intelligible. We 30 make our author at least appear in a poetic dress. We have actually made him more sounding, and more elegant, than he was before in English; and have endeavoured to make him speak that kind of English, which he would have spoken had he lived in England, 35

✓ and had written to this age. If sometimes any of us (and 'tis but seldom) make him express the customs and manners of our native country rather than of Rome, 'tis either when there was some kind of analogy
 5 betwixt their customs and ours, or when, to make him more easy to vulgar understandings, we give him those manners which are familiar to us. But I defend not this innovation, 'tis enough if I can excuse it. For to speak sincerely, the manners of nations and ages are 10 not to be confounded; we should either make them English, or leave them Roman. If this can neither be defended nor excused, let it be pardoned at least, because it is acknowledged; and so much the more easily, as being a fault which is never committed without 15 some pleasure to the reader.

Thus, my Lord, having troubled you with a tedious visit, the best manners will be shown in the least ceremony. I will slip away while your back is turned, and while you are otherwise employed; with great con-20 fusion for having entertained you so long with this discourse, and for having no other recompense to make you, than the worthy labours of my fellow-undertakers in this work, and the thankful acknowledgments, prayers, and perpetual good wishes, of,

MY LORD,

Your Lordship's

Most obliged, most humble, and most obedient Servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

Aug. 18, 1692.

A PARALLEL OF POETRY AND PAINTING

PREFIXED TO THE VERSION OF DU FRESNOY

DE ARTE GRAPHICÂ

*[1695]

It may be reasonably expected that I should say something on my own behalf, in respect to my present undertaking. First, then, the reader may be pleased to know, that it was not of my own choice that I undertook this work. Many of our most skilful painters, and 5 other artists, were pleased to recommend this author to me, as one who perfectly understood the rules of painting; who gave the best and most concise instructions for performance, and the surest to inform the judgment of all who loved this noble art: that they who before 10 were rather fond of it, than knowingly admired it, might defend their inclination by their reason; that they might understand those excellencies which they blindly valued, so as not to be farther imposed on by bad pieces, and to know when nature was well imitated by 15 the most able masters. 'Tis true, indeed, and they acknowledge it, that beside the rules which are given in this treatise, or which can be given in any other, that to make a perfect judgment of good pictures, and to value them more or less, when compared with one 20 another, there is farther required a long conversation with the best pieces, which are not very frequent either in France or England; yet some we have, not only from the hands of Holbein, Rubens, and Vandyck (one of them admirable for history-painting, and the other two for portraits), but of many Flemish masters, and those not inconsiderable, though for design not equal to the Italians. And of these latter also, we are not unfurnished with some pieces of Raphael, Titian, Correggio, Michael Angelo, and others.

But to return to my own undertaking of this translation, I freely own that I thought myself incapable of performing it, either to their satisfaction, or my own credit. Not but that I understood the original Latin, and the French author, perhaps as well as most Englishmen; but I was not sufficiently versed in the terms of art; and therefore thought that many of those persons who put this honourable task on me were more able to perform it themselves, as undoubtedly they were. But they assuring me of their assistance in correcting my faults where I spoke improperly, I was encouraged to attempt it, that I might not be wanting in what I could, to satisfy the desires of so many gentlemen who were willing to give the world this useful work. They have effectually performed their promise to me, and I have been as careful, on my side, to take their advice in all things; so that the reader may assure himself of a tolerable translation. Not elegant, for I proposed not that to myself, but familiar, clear, and instructive. In any of which parts if I have failed, the fault lies wholly at my door. In this one particular only, I must beg the reader's pardon. The prose translation of this poem is not free from poetical expressions, and I dare not promise that some of them are not fustian, or at least highly metaphorical; but this being a fault in the first digestion (that is, the original Latin), was not to be remedied in the second, viz. the translation. And I may confidently say, that whoever had attempted it must have fallen into the same inconvenience, or a much greater, that of a false version.

When I undertook this work, I was already engaged in the translation of Virgil, from whom I have borrowed only two months ; and am now returning to that which I ought to understand better. In the meantime I beg the reader's pardon, for entertaining him so long with myself: 'tis an usual part of ill manners in all authors, and almost in all mankind, to trouble others with their business ; and I was so sensible of it beforehand, that I had not now committed it, unless some concerns of the reader's had been interwoven with my own. But I know not, while I am atoning for one error, if I am not falling into another ; for I have been importuned to say something farther of this art ; and to make some observations on it, in relation to the likeness and agreement which it has with poetry, its sister. But before I proceed, it will not be amiss if I copy from Bellori (a most ingenious author yet living) some part of his Idea of a Painter, which cannot be displeasing, at least to such who are conversant in the philosophy of Plato. And, to avoid tediousness, I will not translate the whole discourse, but take and leave as I find occasion.

'God Almighty, in the fabric of the Universe, first contemplated himself, and reflected on his own excellencies ; from which he drew and constituted those first forms which are called ideas. So that every species which was afterwards expressed was produced from that first idea, forming that wonderful contexture of all created beings. But the celestial bodies above the moon being incorruptible, and not subject to change, remained for ever fair, and in perpetual order ; on the contrary, all things which are sublunary are subject to change, to deformity, and to decay. And though

Nature always intends a consummate beauty in her productions, yet through the inequality of the matter the forms are altered ; and in particular, human beauty suffers alteration for the worse, as we see to our mortification, in the deformities and disproportions which are in us. For which reason, the artful painter and the sculptor, imitating the Divine Maker, form to themselves, as well as they are able, a model of the superior beauties ; and reflecting on them, endeavour to correct and amend the common nature, and to represent it as it was at first created, without fault, either in colour, or in lineament.

‘ This idea, which we may call the goddess of painting and of sculpture, descends upon the marble and the cloth, and becomes the original of those arts ; and being measured by the compass of the intellect, is itself the measure of the performing hand ; and being animated by the imagination, infuses life into the image. The idea of the painter and the sculptor is undoubtedly that perfect and excellent example of the mind, by imitation of which imagined form all things are represented which fall under human sight : such is the definition which is made by Cicero in his book of the Orator to Brutus :—

“ As therefore in forms and figures there is somewhat which is excellent and perfect, to which imagined species all things are referred by imitation, which are the objects of sight, in like manner we behold the species of eloquence in our minds, the effigies or actual image of which we seek in the organs of our hearing.”

This is likewise confirmed by Proclus in the dialogue of Plato, called Timæus. If, says he, you take a man as he is made by nature, and compare him with another, who is the effect of art, the work of nature will always appear the less beautiful, because art is more accurate than nature. But Zeuxis, who, from the choice which he made of five virgins, drew that wonderful picture of Helena, which Cicero, in his Orator before-mentioned, sets before us as the most perfect example of beauty, at the same time admonishes a painter to contemplate the ideas of the most natural 5 forms, and to make a judicious choice of several bodies, all of them the most elegant which he can find ; by which we may plainly understand, that he thought it impossible to find in any one body all those perfections which he sought for the accomplishment of a Helena, 10 because nature in any individual person makes nothing that is perfect in all its parts. For this reason Maximus Tyrius also says, that the image which is taken by a painter from several bodies produces a beauty 15 which it is impossible to find in any single natural body, approaching to the perfection of the fairest statues. Thus nature on this account is so much inferior to art, that those artists who propose to themselves only the imitation and likeness of such or such a particular person, without election of those ideas before-men- 20 tioned, have often been reproached for that omission. Demetrius was taxed for being too natural ; Dionysius was also blamed for drawing men like us, and was commonly called ἀνθρωπογράφος, that is, a painter of men. In our times, Michael Angelo da Caravaggio 25 was esteemed too natural. He drew persons as they were ; and Bamboccio, and most of the Dutch painters, have drawn the worst likeness. Lysippus of old upbraided the common sort of sculptors, for making men such as they were found in nature ; and boasted 30 of himself, that he made them as they ought to be : which is a precept of Aristotle, given as well to poets as to painters. Phidias raised an admiration, even to astonishment, in those who beheld his statues, with the forms which he gave to his gods and heroes, by imitat- 35

ing the idea, rather than nature. And Cicero, speaking of him, affirms, that figuring Jupiter and Pallas, he did not contemplate any object from whence he took the likeness, but considered in his own mind a great and 5 admirable form of beauty; and according to that image in his soul he directed the operation of his hand. Seneca also seems to wonder, that Phidias, having never beheld either Jove or Pallas, yet could conceive their divine images in his mind. Apollonius Tyanæus 10 says the same in other words,—that the fancy more instructs the painter, than the imitation; for the last makes only the things which it sees, but the first makes also the things which it never sees.

‘Leon Battista Alberti tells us, that we ought not so 15 much to love the likeness as the beauty, and to choose from the fairest bodies severally the fairest parts. Leonardo da Vinci instructs the painter to form this idea to himself; and Raphael, the greatest of all modern masters, writes thus to Castiglione, concerning his 20 Galatea: “To paint a fair one, it is necessary for me to see many fair ones; but because there is so great a scarcity of lovely women, I am constrained to make use of one certain idea, which I have formed to myself in my own fancy.” Guido Reni sending to Rome his 25 St. Michael, which he had painted for the church of the Capuchins, at the same time wrote to Monsignor Masano, who was Maestro di Casa (or Steward of the House) to Pope Urban the Eighth, in this manner: “I wish I had the wings of an angel, to have ascended 30 into Paradise, and there to have beheld the forms of those beautiful spirits, from which I might have copied my archangel. But not being able to mount so high, it was in vain for me to search his resemblance here below; so that I was forced to make an introspection
35 into my own mind, and into that idea of beauty which

I have formed in my own imagination. I have likewise created there the contrary idea of deformity and ugliness; but I leave the consideration of it, till I paint the Devil; and in the meantime shun the very thought of it as much as possibly I can, and am even endeavouring to blot it wholly out of my remembrance."

'There was not any lady in all antiquity, who was mistress of so much beauty as was to be found in the Venus of Gnidus, made by Praxiteles, or the Minerva of Athens, by Phidias; which was therefore called the beautiful form. Neither is there any man of the present age equal in the strength, proportion, and knitting of his limbs, to the Hercules of Farnese, made by Glycon; or any woman, who can justly be compared with the Medicean Venus of Cleomenes. And upon this account, the noblest poets and the best orators, when they desired to celebrate any extraordinary beauty, are forced to have recourse to statues and pictures, and to draw their persons and faces into comparison. Ovid, endeavouring to express the beauty of Cyllarus, the fairest of the Centaurs, celebrates him as next in perfection to the most admirable statues:

Gratus in ore vigor, cervix, humerique, manusque, Pectoraque artificum laudatis proxima signis.

A pleasing vigour his fair face expressed;
His neck, his hands, his shoulders, and his breast,
Did next, in gracefulness and beauty, stand
To breathing figures of the sculptor's hand. 25

In another place he sets Apelles above Venus:

Si Venerem Cous nunquam pinxisset Apelles, Mersa sub æquoreis illa lateret aquis. 30

Thus varied:

One birth to seas the Cyprian goddess owed,
A second birth the painter's art bestowed:
Less by the seas than by his power was given;
They made her live, but he advanced to heaven. 35

'The idea of this beauty is indeed various, according to the several forms which the painter or sculptor would describe; as one in strength, another in magnanimity: and sometimes it consists in cheerfulness, and sometimes in delicacy; and is always diversified by the sex and age.

'The beauty of Jove is one, and that of Juno another; Hercules and Cupid are perfect beauties, though of different kinds; for beauty is only that which makes 10 all things as they are in their proper and perfect nature, which the best painters always choose by contemplating the forms of each. We ought farther to consider, that a picture being the representation of a human action, the painter ought to retain in his mind the examples of 15 all affections and passions, as a poet preserves the idea of an angry man, of one who is fearful, sad, or merry, and so of all the rest. For 'tis impossible to express that with the hand, which never entered into the imagination. In this manner, as I have rudely and briefly shewn
20 you, painters and sculptors, choosing the most elegant natural beauties, perfectionate the idea, and advance their art even above nature itself in her individual productions; which is the utmost mastery of human performance.

25 'From hence arises that astonishment, and almost adoration, which is paid by the knowing to those divine remainders of antiquity. From hence Phidias, Lysippus, and other noble sculptors, are still held in veneration; and Apelles, Zeuxis, Protogenes, and other admirable 30 painters, though their works are perished, are and will be eternally admired; who all of them drew after the ideas of perfection, which are the miracles of nature, the providence of the understanding, the exemplars of the mind, the light of the fancy; the sun, which, from which warmed into life the image of Prometheus. 'Tis this, which causes the Graces and the Loves to take up their habitations in the hardest marble, and to subsist in the emptiness of light and shadows. But since the idea of eloquence is as far inferior to that of painting, as the force of words is to the sight, I must here break off abruptly, and having conducted the reader, as it were, to a secret walk, there leave him in the midst of silence, to contemplate those ideas which I have only sketched, and which every man must finish for himself.' •
35 its rising, inspired the statue of Memnon, and the fire,

In these pompous expressions, or such as these, the Italian has given you his Idea of a Painter; and though I cannot much commend the style, I must needs say, there is somewhat in the matter. Plato himself is accustomed to write loftily, imitating, as the critics tell us, the manner of Homer; but surely that inimitable poet had not so much of smoke in his writing, though not less of fire. But in short, this is the present genius of Italy. What Philostratus tells us in the proem of his Figures, is somewhat plainer; and therefore I will translate it almost word for word:—'He who will rightly govern the art of painting, ought of necessity first to understand human nature. He ought likewise to be endued with a genius to express the signs of their passions, whom he represents; and to make the dumb, as it were, to speak. He must yet further understand what is contained in the constitution of the cheeks, in the temperament of the eyes, in the naturalness (if I may so call it) of the eyebrows; and in short, whatsoever belongs to the mind and thought. He who thoroughly possesses all these things will obtain the whole; and the hand will exquisitely represent the action of every particular person, if it happen that he be either mad or angry, melancholic or cheerful, a 35 sprightly youth or a languishing lover ; in one word, he will be able to paint whatsoever is proportionable to any one. And even in all this there is a sweet error, without causing any shame. For the eyes and 5 minds of the beholders being fastened on objects which have no real being, as if they were truly existent, and being induced by them to believe them so, what pleasure is it not capable of giving ? The Ancients, and other

10 wise men, have written many things concerning the symmetry which is in the art of painting,—constituting, as it were, some certain laws for the proportion of every member ; not thinking it possible for a painter to undertake the expression of those motions which are in the mind, without a concurrent harmony in the 15 natural measure. For that which is out of its own kind and measure is not received from Nature, whose motion is always right. On a serious consideration of this matter, it will be found that the art of painting has a wonderful affinity with that of poetry ; and that 20 there is betwixt them a certain common imagination. For as the poets introduce the gods and heroes, and all those things which are either majestic, honest, or delightful, in like manner the painters, by the virtue of their outlines, colours, lights, and shadows, represent 25 the same things and persons in their pictures.'

Thus, as convoy-ships either accompany or should accompany their merchants, till they may prosecute the rest of their voyage without danger ; so Philostratus has brought me thus far on my way, and I can now 30 sail on without him. He has begun to speak of the great relation betwixt painting and poetry, and thither the greatest part of this discourse, by my promise, was directed. I have not engaged myself to any perfect method, neither am I loaded with a full cargo. 'Tis 35 sufficient if I bring a sample of some goods in this voyage. It will be easy for others to add more, when the commerce is settled ; for a treatise twice as large as this of painting could not contain all that might be said on the parallel of these two sister arts. I will take my rise from Bellori, before I proceed to the author 5 of this book.

The business of his preface is to prove that a learned painter should form to himself an idea of perfect nature. This image he is to set before his mind in all his undertakings, and to draw from thence, as from a store- 10 house, the beauties which are to enter into his work ; thereby correcting Nature from what actually she is in individuals, to what she ought to be, and what she was created. Now, as this idea of perfection is of little use in portraits, or the resemblances of particular persons, 15 so neither is it in the characters of Comedy and Tragedy, which are never to be made perfect, but always to be drawn with some specks of frailty and deficiency ; such as they have been described to us in history, if they were real characters, or such as the poet began to 20 shew them at their first appearance, if they were only fictitious or imaginary. The perfection of such stage-characters consists chiefly in their likeness to the deficient faulty nature, which is their original ; only, as it is observed more at large hereafter, in such cases 25 there will always be found a better likeness and a worse, and the better is constantly to be chosen ; I mean in tragedy, which represents the figures of the highest form amongst mankind. Thus in portraits, the painter will not take that side of the face which has some 30 notorious blemish in it ; but either draw it in profile (as Apelles did Antigonus, who had lost one of his eyes), or else shadow the more imperfect side. For an ingenious flattery is to be allowed to the professors of both arts, so long as the likeness is not destroyed. 'Tis 35 true, that all manner of imperfections must not be taken away from the characters; and the reason is, that there may be left some grounds of pity for their misfortunes. We can never be grieved for their miseries who are 5 thoroughly wicked, and have thereby justly called their calamities on themselves. Such men are the natural objects of our hatred, not of our commiseration. If, on the other side, their characters were wholly perfect (such as, for example, the character of a saint or martyr 10 in a play), his or her misfortunes would produce impious thoughts in the beholders; they would accuse the heavens of injustice, and think of leaving a religion where piety was so ill requited. I say, the greater part would be tempted so to do, I say not that they

15 ought; and the consequence is too dangerous for the practice. In this I have accused myself for my own St. Catharine; but let truth prevail. Sophocles has taken the just medium in his Ædipus. He is somewhat arrogant at his first entrance, and is too inquisitive 20 through the whole tragedy; yet these imperfections being balanced by great virtues, they hinder not our compassion for his miseries; neither yet can they destroy that horror which the nature of his crimes has excited in us. Such in painting are the warts and
25 moles, which, adding a likeness to the face, are not therefore to be omitted; but these produce no loathing in us; but how far to proceed, and where to stop, is left to the judgment of the poet and the painter. In Comedy there is somewhat more of the worse likeness 30 to be taken, because that is often to produce laughter, which is occasioned by the sight of some deformity; but for this I refer the reader to Aristotle. 'Tis a sharp manner of instruction for the vulgar, who are never well amended till they are more than sufficiently 35 exposed.

That I may return to the beginning of this remark concerning perfect ideas, I have only this to say,—that the parallel is often true in Epic Poetry. The heroes of the poets are to be drawn according to this rule. There is scarce a frailty to be left in the best of them, 5 any more than is to be found in a divine nature; and if Æneas sometimes weeps, it is not in bemoaning his own miseries, but those which his people undergo. If this be an imperfection, the Son of God, when he was incarnate, shed tears of compassion over Jerusalem; 10 and Lentulus describes him often weeping, but never laughing; so that Virgil is justified even from the Holy Scriptures. I have but one word more, which for once I will anticipate from the author of this book. Though it must be an idea of perfection, from which both the 15 epic poet and the history painter draws, yet all perfections are not suitable to all subjects; but every one must be designed according to that perfect beauty which is proper to him. An Apollo must be distinguished from a Jupiter, a Pallas from a Venus; and so, in 20 poetry, an Æneas from any other hero; for piety is his chief perfection. Homer's Achilles is a kind of exception to this rule; but then he is not a perfect hero, nor so intended by the poet. All his gods had somewhat of human imperfection, for which he has 25 been taxed by Plato, as an imitator of what was bad; but Virgil observed his fault, and mended it. Yet, Achilles was perfect in the strength of his body, and the vigour of his mind. Had he been less passionate, or less revengeful, the poet well foresaw that Hector 30 had been killed, and Troy taken, at the first assault; which had destroyed the beautiful contrivance of his Iliads, and the moral of preventing discord amongst confederate princes, which was his principal intention. For the moral (as Bossu observes) is the first business 35 of the poet, as being the groundwork of his instruction. This being formed, he contrives such a design, or fable, as may be most suitable to the moral; after this he begins to think of the persons whom he is to employ in carrying on his design; and gives them the manners which are most proper to their several characters. The thoughts and words are the last parts, which give beauty and colouring to the piece.

When I say that the manners of the hero ought to be good in perfection, I contradict not the Marquis of Normanby's opinion, in that admirable verse, where, speaking of a perfect character, he calls it A faultless monster, which the world ne'er knew. For that excellent critic intended only to speak of dramatic characters, and not of epic.

Thus at least I have shewn, that in the most perfect poem, which is that of Virgil, a perfect idea was required and followed; and consequently that all succeeding poets ought rather to imitate him, than even Homer. I will now proceed as I promised, to the author of this book.

He tells you almost in the first lines of it, that 'the chief end of Painting is, to please the eyes; and 'tis one great end of Poetry to please the mind.' Thus far the parallel of the arts holds true; with this difference, that the principal end of Painting is to please, and the chief design of Poetry is to instruct. In this the latter seems to have the advantage of the former; but if we consider the artists themselves on both sides, certainly their aims are the very same; they would both make sure of pleasing, and that in preference to instruction. Next, the means of this pleasure is by deceit; one imposes on the sight, and the other on the understanding. Fiction is of the essence of Poetry, as well as of painting; there is a resemblance in one, of human bodies, things, and actions, which are not real; and in the other, of a true story by a fiction; and as all stories are not proper subjects for an epic poem or a tragedy, so neither are they for a noble picture. The subjects both of the one and of the other ought to have nothing 5 of immoral, low, or filthy in them; but this being treated at large in the book itself, I wave it, to avoid repetition. Only I must add, that though Catullus, Ovid, and others, were of another opinion,—that the subject of poets, and even their thoughts and expres- 10 sions, might be loose, provided their lives were chaste and holy, yet there are no such licences permitted in that art, any more than, in painting, to design and colour obscene nudities. Vita proba est, is no excuse; for it will scarcely be admitted, that either a poet or 15 a painter can be chaste, who give us the contrary examples in their writings and their pictures. We see nothing of this kind in Virgil; that which comes the nearest to it is the adventure of the cave, where Dido and Æneas were driven by the storm; yet even there 20 the poet pretends a marriage before the consummation, and Juno herself was present at it. Neither is there any expression in that story, which a Roman matron might not read without a blush. Besides, the poet passes it over as hastily as he can, as if he were afraid 25 of staying in the cave with the two lovers, and of being a witness to their actions. Now I suppose that a painter would not be much commended, who should pick out this cavern from the whole Æneids, when there is not another in the work. He had better leave 30 them in their obscurity, than let in a flash of lightning to clear the natural darkness of the place, by which he must discover himself, as much as them. The altar-pieces and holy decorations of Painting shew that art may be applied to better uses, as well as Poetry; and 35 amongst many other instances, the Farnesian gallery, painted by Annibale Caracci, is a sufficient witness yet remaining; the whole work being morally instructive, and particularly the Herculis Bivium, which is a perfect triumph of virtue over vice; as it is wonderfully well described by the ingenious Bellori.

Hitherto I have only told the reader, what ought not to be the subject of a picture or of a poem. What it ought to be on either side, our author tells us: it must in general be great and noble; and in this the parallel is exactly true. The subject of a poet, either in Tragedy or in an Epic Poem, is a great action of some illustrious hero. It is the same in painting; not every action, nor every person, is considerable enough to enter into the cloth. It must be the anger of an Achilles, the piety of an Æneas, the sacrifice of an Iphigenia, for heroines as well as heroes are comprehended in the rule; but the parallel is more complete in tragedy, than in an epic poem. For as a tragedy may be made out of many particular episodes of Homer or of Virgil, so may a noble picture be designed out of this or that particular story in either author. History is also fruitful of designs both for the painter and the tragic poet: Curtius throwing himself into a gulph, and the two Decii sacrificing themselves for the safety of their country, are subjects for tragedy and picture. Such is Scipio restoring the Spanish bride, whom he either loved, or may be supposed to love; by which he gained the hearts of a great nation to interest themselves for Rome against Carthage. These are all but particular pieces in Livy's History; and yet are full complete subjects for the pen and pencil. Now the reason of this is evident. Tragedy and Picture are more narrowly circumscribed by the mechanic rules of time and place, than the Epic Poem. The time of this last is left indefinite. 'Tis true, Homer took up only the space of eight-and-forty days for his Iliads; but whether Virgil's action was comprehended in a year, or somewhat more, is not determined by Bossu. Homer made the place of his action Troy, and the Grecian camp besieging it. Virgil introduces his Æneas sometimes in Sicily, sometimes in Carthage, and other times at Cumæ, before he brings him to Laurentum; and even after that, he wanders again to the kingdom of Evander, and some parts of Tuscany, before he returns to finish the war by the death of Turnus. But Tragedy, according to the practice of the ancients, was always confined within the compass of twenty-four hours, and seldom takes up so much time. As for the place of it, it was always one, and that not in a larger sense (as for example, a whole city, or two or three several houses in it), but the market, or some other public place, common to the chorus and all the actors; which established law of theirs I have not an opportunity to examine in this place, because I cannot do it without digression from my subject; though it seems too strict at the first appearance, because it excludes all secret intrigues, which are the beauties of the modern stage; for nothing can be carried on with privacy, when the chorus is supposed to be always present. But to proceed; I must say this to the advantage of Painting, even above Tragedy, that what this last represents in the space of many hours, the former shews us in one moment. The action, the passion, and the manners of so many persons as are contained in a picture are to be discerned at once, in the twinkling of an eye; at least they would be so, if the sight could travel over so many different objects all at once, or the mind could digest them all at the same instant, or point of time. Thus, in the famous picture of Poussin, which represents the Institution of the Blessed Sacrament, you see our Saviour and his twelve disciples, all concurring in the same action, after different manners, and in different postures ; only the manners of Judas are distinguished 5 from the rest. Here is but one indivisible point of time observed ; but one action performed by so many persons, in one room, and at the same table ; yet the eye cannot comprehend at once the whole object, nor the mind follow it so fast ; 'tis considered at leisure, 10 and seen by intervals. Such are the subjects of noble pictures ; and such are only to be undertaken by noble hands.

There are other parts of Nature, which are meaner, and yet are the subjects both of painters and of poets.
15 For, to proceed in the parallel ; as Comedy is a representation of human life in inferior persons, and low subjects, and by that means creeps into the nature of poetry, and is a kind of juniper, a shrub belonging to the species of cedar, so is the painting of clowns, the 20 representation of a Dutch kermis, the brutal sport of snick-or-snee, and a thousand other things of this mean invention ; a kind of picture which belongs to nature, but of the lowest form. Such is a Lazar in comparison to a Venus : both are drawn in human figures ; they
25 have faces alike, though not like faces. There is yet a lower sort of poetry and painting, which is out of nature ; for a farce is that in poetry, which grotesque is in a picture. The persons and action of a farce are all unnatural, and the manners false, that is, inconsistent 30 with the characters of mankind. Grotesque painting is the just resemblance of this ; and Horace begins his Art of Poetry by describing such a figure, with a man's head, a horse's neck, the wings of a bird, and a fish's tail ; parts of different species jumbled together, accord-
35 ing to the mad imagination of the dauber ; and the end of all this, as he tells you afterward, to cause laughter : a very monster in a Bartholomew Fair, for the mob to gape at for their two-pence. Laughter is indeed the propriety of a man, but just enough to distinguish him from his elder brother with four legs. 'Tis a kind of 5 bastard-pleasure too, taken in at the eyes of the vulgar gazers, and at the ears of the beastly audience. Church-painters use it to divert the honest countryman at public prayers, and keep his eyes open at a heavy sermon ; and farce-scribblers make use of the same 10 noble invention, to entertain citizens, country-gentlemen, and Covent Garden fops. If they are merry, all goes well on the poet's side. The better sort go thither too, but in despair of sense and the just images of Nature, which are the adequate pleasures of the mind. 15 But the author can give the stage no better than what was given him by Nature ; and the actors must represent such things as they are capable to perform, and by which both they and the scribbler may get their living. After all, 'tis a good thing to laugh at any rate ; 20 and if a straw can tickle a man, it is an instrument of happiness. Beasts can weep when they suffer, but they cannot laugh. And as Sir William D'Avenant observes in his Preface to Gondibert, 'Tis the wisdom of a government to permit plays' (he might have added 25 —farces), 'as 'tis the prudence of a carter to put bells upon his horses, to make them carry their burthens cheerfully.'

I have already shewn, that one main end of Poetry and Painting is to please, and have said something of 30 the kinds of both, and of their subjects, in which they bear a great resemblance to each other. I must now consider them, as they are great and noble arts ; and as they are arts, they must have rules, which may direct them to their common end.

To all arts and sciences, but more particularly to these, may be applied what Hippocrates says of physic, as I find him cited by an eminent French critic: 'Medicine has long subsisted in the world. The principles of it are certain, and it has a certain way; by both which there has been found, in the course of many ages, an infinite number of things, the experience of which has confirmed its usefulness and goodness. All that is wanting to the perfection of this art will undoubtedly be found, if able men, and such as are instructed in the ancient rules, will make a farther inquiry into it; and endeavour to arrive at that which is hitherto unknown, by that which is already known. But all who, having rejected the ancient rules, and taken the opposite ways, yet boast themselves to be masters of this art, do but deceive others, and are themselves deceived; for that is absolutely impossible.'

This is notoriously true in these two arts; for the way to please being to imitate Nature, both the poets and the painters in ancient times, and in the best ages, have studied her; and from the practice of both these arts the rules have been drawn by which we are instructed how to please, and to compass that end which they obtained, by following their example. For Nature is still the same in all ages, and can never be contrary to herself. Thus, from the practice of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, Aristotle drew his rules for tragedy; and Philostratus for painting. Thus, amongst the moderns, the Italian and French critics, by studying the precepts of Aristotle and Horace, and having the example of the Grecian poets before their eyes, have given us the rules of modern tragedy; and thus the critics of the same countries in the art of painting have given the precepts of perfecting that art.

'Tis true that Poetry has one advantage over Painting

in these last ages, that we have still the remaining examples both of the Greek and Latin poets; whereas the painters have nothing left them from Apelles, Protogenes, Parrhasius, Zeuxis, and the rest, but only the testimonies which are given of their incomparable 5 works. But instead of this, they have some of their best statues, bass-relievos, columns, obelisks, &c. which were saved out of the common ruin, and are still preserved in Italy; and by well distinguishing what is proper to Sculpture, and what to Painting, and what is 10 common to them both, they have judiciously repaired that loss. And the great genius of Raphael, and others, having succeeded to the times of barbarism and ignorance, the knowledge of Painting is now arrived to a supreme perfection, though the performance of it is 15 much declined in the present age. The greatest age for Poetry amongst the Romans was certainly that of Augustus Cæsar: and yet we are told that painting was then at its lowest ebb; and perhaps sculpture was also declining at the same time. In the reign of 20 Domitian, and some who succeeded him, Poetry was but meanly cultivated, but Painting eminently flourished. I am not here to give the history of the two arts; how they were both in a manner extinguished by the irruption of the barbarous nations, and both restored about 25 the times of Leo the Tenth, Charles the Fifth, and Francis the First; though I might observe, that neither Ariosto, nor any of his contemporary poets, ever arrived at the excellency of Raphael, Titian, and the rest, in painting. But in revenge, at this time, or lately, in 30 many countries, Poetry is better practised than her sister-art. To what height the magnificence and encouragement of the present King of France may carry Painting and Sculpture, is uncertain; but by what he has done before the war in which he is engaged, we may 35 expect what he will do after the happy conclusion of a peace, which is the prayer and wish of all those who have not an interest to prolong the miseries of Europe. For 'tis most certain, as our author, amongst others, has 5 observed, that reward is the spur of virtue, as well in all good arts, as in all laudable attempts; and emulation, which is the other spur, will never be wanting, either amongst poets or painters, when particular rewards and prizes are proposed to the best deservers.

10 But to return from this digression, though it was almost necessary: all the rules of Painting are methodically, concisely, and yet clearly delivered in this present treatise, which I have translated. Bossu has not given more exact rules for the Epic Poem, nor Dacier for 15 Tragedy, in his late excellent translation of Aristotle, and his notes upon him, than our Fresnoy has made for Painting; with the parallel of which I must resume my discourse, following my author's text, though with more brevity than I intended, because Virgil calls me.

20 The principal and most important part of painting is, to know what is most beautiful in nature, and most proper for that art. That which is the most beautiful is the most noble subject: so in Poetry, Tragedy is more beautiful than Comedy; because, as I said, the persons 25 are greater whom the poet instructs, and consequently the instructions of more benefit to mankind: the action is likewise greater and more noble, and thence is derived the greater and more noble pleasure.

30 To imitate Nature well in whatsoever subject, is the perfection of both arts; and that picture, and that poem, which comes nearest to the resemblance of Nature, is the best. But it follows not, that what pleases most in either kind is therefore good, but what ought to please. Our depraved appetites, and ignorance of the 35 arts, mislead our judgments, and cause us often to take

Why imitation pleases

pp. 136-138

that for true imitation of Nature which has no resemblance of Nature in it. To inform our judgments, and to reform our tastes, rules were invented, that by them we might discern when Nature was imitated, and how nearly. I have been forced to recapitulate these things, 5 because mankind is not more liable to deceit, than it is willing to continue in a pleasing error, strengthened by a long habitude. The imitation of Nature is therefore justly constituted as the general, and indeed the only, rule of pleasing, both in Poetry and Painting. Aristotle 10 tells us, that imitation pleases, because it affords matter for a reasoner to inquire into the truth or falsehood of imitation, by comparing its likeness, or unlikeness, with the original; but by this rule every speculation in nature, whose truth falls under the inquiry of a philo- 15 sopher, must produce the same delight; which is not true. I should rather assign another reason. Truth is the object of our understanding, as good is of our will; and the understanding can no more be delighted with a lie, than the will can choose an apparent evil. As truth 20 is the end of all our speculations, so the discovery of it is the pleasure of them; and since a true knowledge of Nature gives us pleasure, a lively imitation of it, either in Poetry or Painting, must of necessity produce a much greater: for both these arts, as I said before, are not 25 only true imitations of Nature, but of the best Nature, of that which is wrought up to a nobler pitch. They present us with images more perfect than the life in any individual; and we have the pleasure to see all the scattered beauties of Nature united by a happy 30 chemistry, without its deformities or faults. They are imitations of the passions, which always move, and therefore consequently please; for without motion there can be no delight, which cannot be considered but as an active passion. When we view these elevated ideas of 35 nature, the result of that view is admiration, which is always the cause of pleasure.))

This foregoing remark, which gives the reason why imitation pleases, was sent me by Mr. Walter Moyle, a most ingenious young gentleman, conversant in all the studies of humanity much above his years. He had also furnished me, according to my request, with all the particular passages in Aristotle and Horace which are used by them to explain the art of Poetry by that of Painting; which, if ever I have time to retouch this Essay, shall be inserted in their places.

Having thus shewn that imitation pleases, and why it pleases in both these arts, it follows, that some rules of imitation are necessary to obtain the end; for without rules there can be no art, any more than there can be a house without a door to conduct you into it.

The principal parts of Painting and Poetry next follow. Invention is the first part, and absolutely necessary to them both; yet no rule ever was or ever can be given, how to compass it. A happy genius is the gift of nature: it depends on the influence of the stars, say the astrologers; on the organs of the body, say the naturalists; it is the particular gift of Heaven, say the divines, both Christians and heathens. How to improve it, many books can teach us; how to obtain it, none; that nothing can be done without it, all agree:

Tu nihil invita dices faciesve Minerva.

Without invention, a painter is but a copier, and a poet but a plagiary of others. Both are allowed sometimes to copy, and translate; but, as our author tells you, that is not the best part of their reputation. Imitators are but a servile kind of cattle, says the poet; or at best, the keepers of cattle for other men: they have nothing which is properly their own: that is a sufficient mortifification for me, while I am translating Virgil. But to copy the best author is a kind of praise, if I perform it as I ought ; as a copy after Raphael is more to be commended than an original of any indifferent painter.

Under this head of Invention is placed the disposition of the work ; to put all things in a beautiful order and harmony, that the whole may be of a piece. The compositions of the painter should be conformable to the text of ancient authors, to the customs, and the times. And this is exactly the same in Poetry ; Homer and Virgil are to be our guides in the Epic ; Sophocles and Euripides in Tragedy : in all things we are to imitate the customs and the times of those persons and things which we represent : not to make new rules of the drama, as Lopez de Vega has attempted unsuccessfully to do, but to be content to follow our masters, who understood Nature better than we. But if the story which we treat be modern, we are to vary the customs, according to the time and the country where the scene of action lies ; for this is still to imitate Nature, which is always the same, though in a different dress.

As in the composition of a picture the painter is to take care that nothing enter into it which is not proper or convenient to the subject, so likewise is the poet to reject all incidents which are foreign to his poem, and are naturally no parts of it ; they are wens, and other excrescences, which belong not to the body, but deform it. No person, no incident, in the piece, or in the play, but must be of use to carry on the main design. All things else are like six fingers to the hand, when Nature, which is superfluous in nothing, can do her work with five. A painter must reject all trifling ornaments ; so must a poet refuse all tedious and unnecessary descriptions. A robe which is too heavy is less an ornament than a burthen.

In poetry Horace calls these things versus inopes rerum, nugæque canoræ; these are also the lucus et gra Diana, which he mentions in the same Art of Poetry. But since there must be ornaments both in painting and 5 poetry, if they are not necessary, they must at least be decent; that is, in their due place, and but moderately used. The painter is not to take so much pains about the drapery, as about the face, where the principal resemblance lies; neither is the poet, who is working 10 up a passion, to make similes, which will certainly make it languish. My Montezuma dies with a fine one in his mouth; but it is ambitious, and out of season. When there are more figures in a picture than are necessary, or at least ornamental, our author calls them figures to 15 be let; because the picture has no use of them. So I have seen in some modern plays above twenty actors, when the action has not required half the number. In the principal figures of a picture, the painter is to employ the sinews of his art; for in them consists the principal 20 beauty of his work. Our author saves me the comparison with Tragedy; for he says, that herein he is to imitate the tragic poet, who employs his utmost force in those places wherein consists the height and beauty of the action.

Du Fresnoy, whom I follow, makes design, or drawing, 25 the second part of painting; but the rules which he gives concerning the posture of the figures are almost wholly proper to that art, and admit not any comparison, that I know, with poetry. The posture of a poetic figure is, as I conceive, the description of his heroes in the 30 performance of such or such an action; as of Achilles, just in the act of killing Hector, or of Æneas, who has Turnus under him. Both the poet and the painter vary the posture, according to the action or passion which they represent, of the same person; but all must be great 35 and graceful in them. The same Æneas must be drawn a suppliant to Dido, with respect in his gestures, and humility in his eyes ; but when he is forced, in his own defence, to kill Lausus, the poet shows him compassionate, and tempering the severity of his looks with a reluctance to the action which he is going to perform. 5 He has pity on his beauty and his youth, and is loth to destroy such a masterpiece of nature. He considers Lausus, rescuing his father at the hazard of his own life, as an image of himself, when he took Anchises on his shoulders, and bore him safe through the rage of the 10 fire, and the opposition of his enemies ; and therefore, in the posture of a retiring man, who avoids the combat, he stretches out his arm in sign of peace, with his right foot drawn a little back, and his breast bending inward, more like an orator than a soldier ; and seems to dis- 15 suade the young man from pulling on his destiny, by attempting more than he was able to perform. Take the passage as I have thus translated it :

Shouts of applause ran ringing through the field,
To see the son the vanquish'd father shield :	20
All, fir'd with noble emulation, strive,
And with a storm of darts to distance drive
The Trojan chief ; who, held at bay, from far
On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war.
Aeneas , thus o'erwhelm'd on every side,	} 25
Their first assault undaunted did abide,
And thus to Lausus , loud with friendly threatening cry'd :—
Why wilt thou rush to certain death, and rage,
In rash attempts, beyond thy tender age,
Betray'd by pious love?	30

And afterwards :

He griev'd, he wept ; the sight an image brought
Of his own filial love ; a sadly pleasing thought.

But beside the outlines of the posture, the design of the picture comprehends, in the next place, the forms 35 of faces, which are to be different ; and so in a poem or a play must the several characters of the persons be distinguished from each other. I knew a poet, whom out of respect I will not name, who, being too witty himself, could draw nothing but wits in a comedy of his ;

5 even his fools were infected with the disease of their author. They overflowed with smart reparties, and were only distinguished from the intended wits by being called coxcombs, though they deserved not so scandalous a name. Another, who had a great genius for 10 Tragedy, following the fury of his natural temper, made every man, and woman too, in his plays, stark raging mad ; there was not a sober person to be had for love or money. All was tempestuous and blustering ; heaven and earth were coming together at every word ; a mere 15 hurricane from the beginning to the end, and every actor seemed to be hastening on the day of judgment.

Let every member be made for its own head, says our author ; not a withered hand to a young face. So, in the persons of a play, whatsoever is said or done by any 20 of them must be consistent with the manners which the poet has given them distinctly ; and even the habits must be proper to the degrees and humours of the persons, as well as in a picture. He who entered in the first act a young man, like Pericles, Prince of Tyre, must not 25 be in danger, in the fifth act, of committing incest with his daughter ; nor an usurer, without great probability, and causes of repentance, be turned into a cutting Morecraft.

I am not satisfied, that the comparison betwixt the 30 two arts in the last paragraph is altogether so just as it might have been ; but I am sure of this which follows :

The principal figure of the subject must appear in the midst of the picture, under the principal light, to distinguish 35 it from the rest, which are only its attendants. Thus, in a tragedy, or an epic poem, the hero of the piece must be advanced foremost to the view of the reader, or spectator: he must outshine the rest of all the characters; he must appear the prince of them, like the sun in the Copernican system, encompassed with the less noble planets: because the hero is the centre of the main action; all the lines from the circumference tend to him alone: he is the chief object of pity in the drama, and of admiration in the epic poem.

As in a picture, besides the principal figures which compose it, and are placed in the midst of it, there are less groups or knots of figures disposed at proper distances, which are parts of the piece, and seem to carry on the same design in a more inferior manner; so, in epic poetry there are episodes, and a chorus in tragedy, which are members of the action, as growing out of it, not inserted into it. Such in the ninth book of the Æneids is the episode of Nisus and Euryalus. The adventure belongs to them alone; they alone are the objects of compassion and admiration; but their business which they carry on is the general concernment of the Trojan camp, then beleaguered by Turnus and the Latins, as the Christians were lately by the Turks. They were to advertise the chief hero of the distresses of his subjects occasioned by his absence, to crave his succour, and solicit him to hasten his return.

The Grecian Tragedy was at first nothing but a chorus of singers; afterwards one actor was introduced, which was the poet himself, who entertained the people with a discourse in verse, betwixt the pauses of the singing. This succeeding with the people, more actors were added, to make the variety the greater; and, in process of time, the chorus only sung betwixt the acts, and the Coryphæus, or chief of them, spoke for the rest, as an actor concerned in the business of the play.

Thus Tragedy was perfected by degrees ; and being arrived at that perfection, the painters might probably take the hint from thence of adding groups to their pictures. But as a good picture may be without a group, so a good tragedy may subsist without a chorus, notwithstanding any reasons which have been given by Dacier to the contrary.

Monsieur Racine has, indeed, used it in his Esther ; but not that he found any necessity of it, as the French critic would insinuate. The chorus at St. Cyr was only to give the young ladies an occasion of entertaining the king with vocal music, and of commending their own voices. The play itself was never intended for the public stage, nor, without disparagement to the learned author, could possibly have succeeded there ; and much less the translation of it here. Mr. Wycherley, when we read it together, was of my opinion in this, or rather I of his ; for it becomes me so to speak of so excellent a poet, and so great a judge. But since I am in this place, as Virgil says, spatiis exclusus iniquis, that is, shortened in my time, I will give no other reason, than that it is impracticable on our stage. A new theatre, much more ample and much deeper, must be made for that purpose, besides the cost of sometimes forty or fifty habits, which is an expence too large to be supplied by a company of actors. 'Tis true, I should not be sorry to see a chorus on a theatre more than as large and as deep again as ours, built and adorned at a king's charges ; and on that condition, and another, which is, that my hands were not bound behind me, as now they are, I should not despair of making such a tragedy as might be both instructive and delightful, according to the manner of the Grecians.

To make a sketch, or a more perfect model of a picture, is, in the language of poets, to draw up the scenary of a play ; and the reason is the same for both ; to guide the undertaking, and to preserve the remembrance of such things, whose natures are difficult to retain.

To avoid absurdities and incongruities, is the same law established for both arts. The painter is not to paint a cloud at the bottom of a picture, but in the uppermost parts ; nor the poet to place what is proper to the end or middle, in the beginning of a poem. I might enlarge on this ; but there are few poets or painters who can be supposed to sin so grossly against the laws of nature and of art. I remember only one play, and for once I will call it by its name, The Slighted Maid, where there is nothing in the first act but what might have been said or done in the fifth ; nor anything in the midst, which might not have been placed as well in the beginning, or the end. To express the passions which are seated in the heart, by outward signs, is one great precept of the painters, and very difficult to perform. In poetry, the same passions and motions of the mind are to be expressed ; and in this consists the principal difficulty, as well as the excellency of that art. This, says my author, is the gift of Jupiter ; and, to speak in the same heathen language, we call it the gift of our Apollo—not to be obtained by pains or study, if we are not born to it ; for the motions which are studied are never so natural as those which break out in the height of a real passion. Mr. Otway possessed this part as thoroughly as any of the Ancients or Moderns. I will not defend everything in his Venice Preserved ; but I must bear this testimony to his memory, that the passions are truly touched in it, though perhaps there is somewhat to be desired, both in the grounds of them, and in the height and elegance of expression ; but nature is there, which is the greatest beauty.

35

In the passions, says our author, we must have a very great regard to the quality of the persons who are actually possessed with them. The joy of a monarch for the news of a victory must not be expressed like the 5 ecstasy of a Harlequin on the receipt of a letter from his mistress: this is so much the same in both the arts, that it is no longer a comparison. What he says of face-painting, or the portrait of any one particular person, concerning the likeness, is also as applicable to 10 poetry. In the character of an hero, as well as in an inferior figure, there is a better or worse likeness to be taken: the better is a panegyric, if it be not false, and the worse is a libel. Sophocles, says Aristotle, always drew men as they ought to be, that is, better than they
15 were; another, whose name I have forgotten, drew them worse than naturally they were: Euripides altered nothing in the character, but made them such as they were represented by history, epic poetry, or tradition. Of the three, the draught of Sophocles is most com-
20 mended by Aristotle. I have followed it in that part of Ædipus which I writ, though perhaps I have made him too good a man. But my characters of Antony and Cleopatra, though they are favourable to them, have nothing of outrageous panegyric. Their passions were 25 their own, and such as were given them by history; only the deformities of them were cast into shadows, that they might be objects of compassion: whereas if I had chosen a noon-day light for them, somewhat must have been discovered which would rather have moved 30 our hatred than our pity.

The Gothic manner, and the barbarous ornaments, which are to be avoided in a picture, are just the same with those in an ill-ordered play. For example, our English tragi-comedy must be confessed to be wholly 35 Gothic, notwithstanding the success which it has found upon our theatre, and in the Pastor Fido of Guarini; even though Corisca and the Satyr contribute somewhat to the main action. Neither can I defend my Spanish Friar, as fond as otherwise I am of it, from this imputation: for though the comical parts are diverting, and the serious moving, yet they are of an unnatural mingle: for mirth and gravity destroy each other, and are no more to be allowed for decent than a gay widow laughing in a mourning habit.

I had almost forgotten one considerable resemblance. Du Fresnoy tells us, That the figures of the groups must not be all on a side, that is, with their face and bodies all turned the same way; but must contrast each other by their several positions. Thus in a play, some characters must be raised, to oppose others, and to set them off the better; according to the old maxim, contraria juxta se posita magis elucescunt. Thus, in The Scornful Lady, the usurer is set to confront the prodigal: thus, in Tyrannic Love, the atheist Maximin is opposed to the character of St. Catherine.

I am now come, though with the omission of many likenesses, to the Third Part of Painting, which is called the Chromatic, or Colouring. Expression, and all that belongs to words, is that in a poem which colouring is in a picture. The colours well chosen in their proper places, together with the lights and shadows which belong to them, lighten the design, and make it pleasing to the eye. The words, the expressions, the tropes and figures, the versification, and all the other elegancies of sound, as cadences, turns of words upon the thought, and many other things, which are all parts of expression, perform exactly the same office both in dramatic and epic poetry. Our author calls Colouring, lena sororis; in plain English, the bawd of her sister, the design or drawing: she clothes, she dresses her up, she paints

On expression or colouring
pp. 147-148

her, she makes her appear more lovely than naturally she is; she procures for the design, and makes lovers for her: for the design of itself is only so many naked lines. Thus in poetry, the expression is that which 5 charms the reader, and beautifies the design, which is only the outlines of the fable. 'Tis true, the design must of itself be good; if it be vicious, or, in one word, unpleasing, the cost of colouring is thrown away upon it: 'tis an ugly woman in a rich habit set out with 10 jewels; nothing can become her; but granting the design to be moderately good, it is like an excellent complexion with indifferent features: the white and red well mingled on the face make what was before but passable appear beautiful. Operum colores is the very 15 word which Horace uses to signify words and elegant expressions, of which he himself was so great a master in his Odes. Amongst the ancients, Zeuxis was most famous for his colouring; amongst the moderns, Titian and Correggio. Of the two ancient epic poets, who 20 have so far excelled all the moderns, the invention and design were the particular talents of Homer. Virgil must yield to him in both; for the design of the Latin was borrowed from the Grecian: but the dictio Virgiliana, the expression of Virgil, his colour-
25 ing, was incomparably the better; and in that I have always endeavoured to copy him. Most of the pedants, I know, maintain the contrary, and will have Homer excel even in this part. But of all people, as they are the most ill-mannered, so they are the worst judges.
30 Even of words, which are their province, they seldom know more than the grammatical construction, unless they are born with a poetical genius, which is a rare portion amongst them. Yet some I know may stand excepted; and such I honour. Virgil is so exact in 35 every word, that none can be changed but for a worse;

nor any one removed from its place, but the harmony will be altered. He pretends sometimes to trip; but it is only to make you think him in danger of a fall, when he is most secure: like a skilful dancer on the ropes (if you will pardon the meanness of the simile), who slips willingly, and makes a seeming stumble, that you may think him in great hazard of breaking his neck, while at the same time he is only giving you a proof of his dexterity. My late Lord Roscommon was often pleased with this reflection, and with the examples of it in this admirable author.

I have not leisure to run through the whole comparison of lights and shadows with tropes and figures; yet I cannot but take notice of metaphors, which like them have power to lessen or greaten anything. Strong and glowing colours are the just resemblances of bold metaphors: but both must be judiciously applied; for there is a difference betwixt daring and fool-hardiness. Lucan and Statius often ventured them too far; our Virgil never. But the great defect of the Pharsalia and the Thebais was in the design: if that had been more perfect, we might have forgiven many of their bold strokes in the colouring, or at least excused them: yet some of them are such as Demosthenes or Cicero could not have defended. Virgil, if he could have seen the first verses of the Sylvæ, would have thought Statius mad, in his fustian description of the statue on the brazen horse. But that poet was always in a foam at his setting out, even before the motion of the race had warmed him. The soberness of Virgil, whom he read, it seems, to little purpose, might have shewn him the difference betwixt

Arma virumque cano . . .

and

Magnanimum Æacidem, formidatamque tonanti Progeniem.

But Virgil knew how to rise by degrees in his expressions: Statius was in his towering heights at the first stretch of his pinions. The description of his running horse, just starting in the Funeral Games for Archemorus, though the verses are wonderfully fine, are the true image of their author:

Stare adeo nescit, pereunt vestigia mille Ante fugam; absentemque fert gravis ungula campum;

which would cost me an hour, if I had the leisure to translate them, there is so much of beauty in the original.

Virgil, as he better knew his colours, so he knew better how and where to place them. In as much haste as I am, I cannot forbear giving one example. It is said of him, that he read the Second, Fourth, and Sixth Books of his Æneids to Augustus Cæsar. In the Sixth (which we are sure he read, because we know Octavia was present, who rewarded him so bountifully for the twenty verses which were made in honour of her deceased son, Marcellus), in this Sixth Book, I say, the poet, speaking of Misenus, the trumpeter, says:

*... quo non præstantior aller
Ære ciere viros, ...*

and broke off in the hemistic, or midst of the verse; but in the very reading, seized as it were with a divine fury, he made up the latter part of the hemistic with these following words:

... Martemque accendere cantu.

How warm, nay, how glowing a colouring is this! In the beginning of his verse, the word æs, or brass, was taken for a trumpet, because the instrument was made of that metal, which of itself was fine; but in the latter end, which was made ex tempore, you see three metaphors, Martemque,—accendere,—cantu. Good Heavens!

how the plain sense is raised by the beauty of the words ! But this was happiness, the former might be only judgment : this was the curiosa felicitas, which Petronius attributes to Horace ; it is the pencil thrown luckily full upon the horse's mouth, to express the foam which the painter with all his skill could not perform without it. These hits of words a true poet often finds, as I may say, without seeking ; but he knows their value when he finds them, and is infinitely pleased. A bad poet may sometimes light on them, but he discerns not a diamond from a Bristol-stone ; and would have been of the cock's mind in Æsop ; a grain of barley would have pleased him better than the jewel.

The lights and shadows which belong to colouring put me in mind of that verse in Horace :

Hoc amat obscurum, vult hoc sub luce videri.

Some parts of a poem require to be amply written, and with all the force and elegance of words ; others must be cast into shadows, that is, passed over in silence, or but faintly touched. This belongs wholly to the judgment of the poet and the painter. The most beautiful parts of the picture, and the poem, must be the most finished, the colours and words most chosen ; many things in both, which are not deserving of this care, must be shifted off ; content with vulgar expressions, and those very short, and left, as in a shadow, to the imagination of the reader.

We have the proverb, manum de tabula, from the painters ; which signifies, to know when to give over, and to lay by the pencil. Both Homer and Virgil practised this precept wonderfully well, but Virgil the better of the two. Homer knew, that when Hector was slain Troy was as good as already taken ; therefore he concludes his action there : for what follows in the funerals of Patroclus, and the redemption of Hector's body, is not, properly speaking, a part of the main action. But Virgil concludes with the death of Turnus; for after that difficulty was removed Æneas might 5 marry, and establish the Trojans, when he pleased. This rule I had before my eyes in the conclusion of the Spanish Friar, when the discovery was made that the king was living, which was the knot of the play untied; the rest is shut up in the compass of some few lines, 10 because nothing then hindered the happiness of Torrismond and Leonora. The faults of that drama are in the kind of it, which is tragi-comedy. But it was given to the people: and I never writ anything for myself but Antony and Cleopatra.

15 This remark, I must acknowledge, is not so proper for the colouring, as the design; but it will hold for both. As the words, &c., are evidently shown to be the clothing of the thought, in the same sense as colours are the clothing of the design, so the painter and the 20 poet ought to judge exactly, when the colouring and expressions are perfect, and then to think their work is truly finished. Apelles said of Protogenes,—that he knew not when to give over. A work may be over-wrought, as well as under-wrought; too much labour 25 often takes away the spirit by adding to the polishing, so that there remains nothing but a dull correctness, a piece without any considerable faults, but with few beauties; for when the spirits are drawn off, there is nothing but a caput mortuum. Statius never thought 30 an expression could be bold enough; and if a bolder could be found, he rejected the first. Virgil had judgment enough to know daring was necessary; but he knew the difference betwixt a glowing colour and a glaring: as when he compared the shocking of the foundations, and meeting in the ocean. He knew the comparison was forced beyond nature, and raised too high; he therefore softens the metaphor with a credas: you would almost believe that mountains or islands rushed against each other :
 35 fleets at Actium to the jostling of islands rent from their

5

... credas innare revulsas

Cycladas, aut montes concurrere montibus altos.

But here I must break off without finishing the discourse. Cynthius aurem vellit, et admonuit, &c. The things which are behind are of too nice a consideration 10 for an essay, begun and ended in twelve mornings; and perhaps the judges of painting and poetry, when I tell them how short a time it cost me, may make me the same answer which my late Lord Rochester made to one, who, to commend a tragedy, said it was written in 15 three weeks: 'How the devil could he be so long about it?' For that poem was infamously bad; and I doubt this Parallel is little better; and then the shortness of the time is so far from being a commendation, that it is scarcely an excuse. But if I have really drawn a por- 20 trait to the knees, or an half-length, with a tolerable likeness, then I may plead, with some justice, for myself, that the rest is left to the imagination. Let some better artist provide himself of a deeper canvas, and, taking these hints which I have given, set the figure 25 on its legs, and finish it in the invention, design, and colouring.

DEDICATION OF THE ÆNEIS

[1697]

TO THE MOST HONOURABLE

JOHN,

LORD MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, EARL OF

MULGRAVE, ETC., AND KNIGHT OF

THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF

THE GARTER

A HEROIC POEM, truly such, is undoubtedly the greatest work which the soul of man is capable to perform. The design of it is to form the mind to heroic virtue by example; 'tis conveyed in verse, that it may 5 delight, while it instructs. The action of it is always one, entire, and great. The least and most trivial episodes, or under-actions, which are interwoven in it, are parts either necessary or convenient to carry on the main design; either so necessary, that, without them, 10 the poem must be imperfect, or so convenient, that no others can be imagined more suitable to the place in which they are. There is nothing to be left void in a firm building; even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength, but with brick or stone, though of less pieces, yet of the same nature, and fitted to the crannies¹. Even the least portions of them must be of the epic kind: all things must be grave, majestic, and sublime; nothing of a foreign nature, like the trifling 5 novels, which Ariosto¹, and others, have inserted in their poems; by which the reader is misled into another sort of pleasure, opposite to that which is designed in an epic poem. One raises the soul, and hardens it to virtue; the other softens it again, and unbends it into vice. One conduces to the poet's aim, the completing of his work, which he is driving on, labouring and hastening in every line; the other slackens his pace, diverts him from his way, and locks him up like a knight-errant in an enchanted castle, when he should be pur- 15 suing his first adventure. Statius, as Bossu has well observed, was ambitious of trying his strength with his master Virgil, as Virgil had before tried his with Homer. The Grecian gave the two Romans an example, in the games which were celebrated at the funerals of 20 Patroclus. Virgil imitated the invention of Homer, but changed the sports. But both the Greek and Latin poet took their occasions from the subject; though, to confess the truth, they were both ornamental, or, at best, convenient parts of it, rather than of necessity arising 25 from it. Statius, who, through his whole poem, is noted for want of conduct and judgment, instead of staying, as he might have done, for the death of Capaneus, Hippomedon, Tydeus, or some other of his seven champions (who are heroes all alike), or more properly 30 for the tragical end of the two brothers, whose exequies the next successor had leisure to perform when the siege was raised, and in the interval betwixt the poet's first action and his second—went out of his way, as it were on prepense malice, to commit a fault. For he took his opportunity to kill a royal infant by the means of a serpent (that author of all evil), to make way for those funeral honours which he intended for him. Now, if this innocent had been of any relation to his Thebais; if he had either furthered or hindered the taking of the town; the poet might have found some sorry excuse at least for detaining the reader from the promised siege.

¹ 'The early editions, by an absurd and continued blunder, read Aristotle.' (Scott.)

10 I can think of nothing to plead for him but what I verily believe he thought himself, which was, that as the funerals of Anchises were solemnised in Sicily, so those of Archemorus should be celebrated in Candy. For the last was an island, and a better than the first,

15 because Jove was born there. On these terms, this Capaneus of a poet engaged his two immortal predecessors; and his success was answerable to his enterprise.

If this œconomy must be observed in the minutest

20 parts of an epic poem, which, to a common reader, seems to be detached from the body, and almost independent of it; what soul, though sent into the world with great advantages of Nature, cultivated with the liberal arts and sciences, conversant with histories of

25 the dead, and enriched with observations on the living, can be sufficient to inform the whole body of so great a work? I touch here but transiently, without any strict method, on some few of those many rules of imitating nature which Aristotle drew from Homer's

30 Iliads and Odysseys, and which he fitted to the drama; furnishing himself also with observations from the practice of the theatre, when it flourished under Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. For the original of the stage was from the Epic Poem. Narration,

35 doubtless, preceded acting, and gave laws to it: what at first was told artfully, was, in process of time, represented gracefully to the sight and hearing. Those episodes of Homer, which were proper for the stage, the poets amplified each into an action; out of his limbs they formed their bodies; what he had contracted, they enlarged; out of one Hercules were made infinity of pigmies, yet all endued with human souls; for from him, their great creator, they have each of them the divinæ particulam auræ. They flowed from him at first, and are at last resolved into him. Nor were they only animated by him, but their measure and symmetry was owing to him. His one, entire, and great action was copied by them according to the proportions of the drama. If he finished his orb within the year, it sufficed to teach them, that their action being less, and being also less diversified with incidents, their orb, of consequence, must be circumscribed in a less compass, which they reduced within the limits either of a natural or an artificial day; so that, as he taught them to amplify what he had shortened, by the same rule, applied the contrary way, he taught them to shorten what he had amplified. Tragedy is the miniature of human life; an epic poem is the draught at length. Here, my Lord, I must contract also; for, before I was aware, I was almost running into a long digression, to prove that there is no such absolute necessity that the time of a stage action should so strictly be confined to twenty-four hours as never to exceed them, for which Aristotle contends, and the Grecian stage has practised. Some longer space, on some occasions, I think, may be allowed, especially for the English theatre, which requires more variety of incidents than the French. Corneille himself, after long practice, was inclined to think that the time allotted by the Ancients was too short to raise and finish a great action: and better a mechanic rule were stretched or broken, than a great beauty were omitted. To raise, and afterwards to calm the passions—to purge the soul from pride, by the examples of human miseries, which 5 befall the greatest—in few words, to expel arrogance, and introduce compassion, are the great effects of tragedy. Great, I must confess, if they were altogether as true as they are pompous. But are habits to be introduced at three hours' warning? are radical diseases

10 so suddenly removed? A mountebank may promise such a cure, but a skilful physician will not undertake it. An epic poem is not in so much haste: it works leisurely; the changes which it makes are slow; but the cure is likely to be more perfect. The effects of 15 tragedy, as I said, are too violent to be lasting. If it be answered that, for this reason, tragedies are often to be seen, and the dose to be repeated, this is tacitly to confess that there is more virtue in one heroic poem than in many tragedies. A man is humbled one day, 20 and his pride returns the next. Chymical medicines are observed to relieve oftener than to cure: for 'tis the nature of spirits to make swift impressions, but not deep. Galenical decoctions, to which I may properly compare an epic poem, have more of body in them;
25 they work by their substance and their weight. It is one reason of Aristotle's to prove that Tragedy is the more noble, because it turns in a shorter compass; the whole action being circumscribed within the space of four-and-twenty hours. He might prove as well that 30 a mushroom is to be preferred before a peach, because it shoots up in the compass of a night. A chariot may be driven round the pillar in less space than a large machine, because the bulk is not so great. Is the Moon a more noble planet than Saturn, because she 35 makes her revolution in less than thirty days, and he

in little less than thirty years? Both their orbs are in proportion to their several magnitudes; and consequently the quickness or slowness of their motion, and the time of their circumvolutions, is no argument of the greater or less perfection. And, besides, what virtue is there in a tragedy which is not contained in an epic poem, where pride is humbled, virtue rewarded, and vice punished; and those more amply treated than the narrowness of the drama can admit? The shining quality of an epic hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, or whatever characteristic virtue his poet gives him, raises first our admiration; we are naturally prone to imitate what we admire; and frequent acts produce a habit. If the hero's chief quality be vicious, as, for example, the choler and obstinate desire of vengeance in Achilles, yet the moral is instructive: and, besides, we are informed in the very proposition of the Iliads, that this anger was pernicious; that it brought a thousand ills on the Grecian camp. The courage of Achilles is proposed to imitation, not his pride and disobedience to his general, nor his brutal cruelty to his dead enemy, nor the selling of his body to his father. We abhor these actions while we read them; and what we abhor we never imitate. The poet only shows them, like rocks or quicksands, to be shunned.

By this example, the critics have concluded that it is not necessary the manners of the hero should be virtuous. They are poetically good, if they are of a piece: though where a character of perfect virtue is set before us, it is more lovely; for there the whole hero is to be imitated. This is the Æneas of our author; this is that idea of perfection in an epic poem which painters and statuaries have only in their minds, and which no hands are able to express. These are the beauties of a god in a human body. When the picture of Achilles is drawn in tragedy, he is taken with those warts, and moles, and hard features by those who represent him on the stage, or he is no more Achilles; for his creator, Homer, has so 5 described him. Yet even thus he appears a perfect hero, though an imperfect character of virtue. Horace paints him after Homer, and delivers him to be copied on the stage with all those imperfections. Therefore they are either not faults in a heroic poem, or faults

10 common to the drama. After all, on the whole merits of the cause, it must be acknowledged that the Epic Poem is more for the manners, and Tragedy for the passions. The passions, as I have said, are violent; and acute distempers require medicines of a strong and 15 speedy operation. Ill habits of the mind are like chronic diseases, to be corrected by degrees, and cured by alteratives; wherein, though purges are sometimes necessary, yet diet, good air, and moderate exercise have the greatest part. The matter being thus stated,
20 it will appear that both sorts of poetry are of use for their proper ends. The stage is more active; the Epic Poem works at greater leisure, yet is active too, when need requires; for dialogue is imitated by the drama from the more active parts of it. One puts off a fit, 25 like the quinquina, and relieves us only for a time; the other roots out the distemper, and gives a healthful habit. The sun enlightens and cheers us, dispels fogs, and warms the ground with his daily beams; but the corn is sowed, increases, is ripened, and is reaped for 30 use in process of time, and in its proper season. I proceed, from the greatness of the action, to the dignity of the actors; I mean to the persons employed in both poems. There likewise Tragedy will be seen to borrow from the Epopee; and that which borrows is always of it is true, may lend to his sovereign; but the act of borrowing makes the king inferior, because he wants, and the subject supplies. And suppose the persons of the drama wholly fabulous, or of the poet's invention, yet Heroic Poetry gave him the examples of that invention, because it was first, and Homer the common father of the stage. I know not of any one advantage which Tragedy can boast above Heroic Poetry, but that it is represented to the view, as well as read, and instructs in the closet, as well as on the theatre. This is an uncontended excellence, and a chief branch of its prerogative; yet I may be allowed to say, without partiality, that herein the actors share the poet's praise. Your Lordship knows some modern tragedies which are beautiful on the stage, and yet I am confident you would not read them. Tryphon the stationer complains they are seldom asked for in his shop. The poet who flourished in the scene is damned in the ruelle; nay more, he is not esteemed a good poet by those, who see and hear his extravagances with delight. They are a sort of stately fustian, and lofty childishness. Nothing but Nature can give a sincere pleasure; where that is not imitated, 'tis grotesque painting; the fine woman ends in a fish's tail.
35 less dignity, because it has not of its own. A subject,

I might also add that many things, which not only please, but are real beauties in the reading, would appear absurd upon the stage; and those not only the speciosa miracula, as Horace calls them, of transformations, of Scylla, Antiphates, and the Læstrygons, which cannot be represented even in operas; but the prowess of Achilles or Æneas would appear ridiculous in our dwarf heroes of the theatre. We can believe they routed armies, in Homer or in Virgil; but ne Hercules contra duos in the drama. I forbear to instance in many things, which the stage cannot, or ought not to represent ; for I have said already more than I intended on this subject, and should fear it might be turned against me, that I plead for the pre-eminence of Epic Poetry because I have taken some pains in translating Virgil, 5 if this were the first time that I had delivered my opinion in this dispute. But I have more than once already maintained the rights of my two masters against their rivals of the scene, even while I wrote tragedies myself, and had no thoughts of this present undertaking. I submit my opinion to your judgment, who 10 are better qualified than any man I know, to decide this controversy. You come, my Lord, instructed in the cause, and needed not that I should open it. Your Essay of Poetry, which was published without a name, 15 and of which I was not honoured with the confidence, I read over and over with much delight, and as much instruction, and, without flattering you, or making myself more moral than I am, not without some envy. I was loath to be informed how an epic poem should 20 be written, or how a tragedy should be contrived and managed, in better verse, and with more judgment, than I could teach others. A native of Parnassus, and bred up in the studies of its fundamental laws, may receive new lights from his contemporaries ; but it is a grudging 25 kind of praise which he gives his benefactors. He is more obliged than he is willing to acknowledge ; there is a tincture of malice in his commendations. For where I own I am taught, I confess my want of knowledge. A judge upon the bench may, out of good 30 nature, or at least interest, encourage the pleadings of a puny counsellor ; but he does not willingly commend his brother serjeant at the bar, especially when he controuls his law, and exposes that ignorance which is made sacred by his place. I gave the unknown 35 author his due commendation, I must confess ; but who can answer for me and for the rest of the poets who heard me read the poem, whether we should not have been better pleased to have seen our own names at the bottom of the title-page? Perhaps we commended it the more, that we might seem to be above 5 the censure. We are naturally displeased with an unknown critic, as the ladies are with a lampooner, because we are bitten in the dark, and know not where to fasten our revenge. But great excellencies will work their way through all sorts of opposition. I applauded 10 rather out of decency than affection; and was ambitious, as some yet can witness, to be acquainted with a man with whom I had the honour to converse, and that almost daily, for so many years together. Heaven knows, if I have heartily forgiven you this deceit. You 15 extorted a praise, which I should willingly have given, had I known you. Nothing had been more easy than to commend a patron of a long standing. The world would join with me, if the encomiums were just; and, if unjust, would excuse a grateful flatterer. But to 20 come anonymous upon me, and force me to commend you against my interest, was not altogether so fair, give me leave to say, as it was politic. For, by concealing your quality, you might clearly understand how your work succeeded, and that the general approbation was 25 given to your merit, not your titles. Thus, like Apelles, you stood unseen behind your own Venus, and received the praises of the passing multitude; the work was commended, not the author; and I doubt not, this was one of the most pleasing adventures of your life. 30

I have detained your Lordship longer than I intended in this dispute of preference betwixt the Epic Poem and the Drama, and yet have not formally answered any of the arguments which are brought by Aristotle on the other side, and set in the fairest light 35

by Dacier. But I suppose, without looking on the book, I may have touched on some of the objections ; for, in this address to your Lordship, I design not a Treatise of Heroic Poetry, but write in a loose epistolary way, somewhat tending to that subject, after the example of Horace, in his First Epistle of the Second Book to Augustus Cæsar, and in that to the Piso's, which we call his Art of Poetry ; in both of which he observes no method that I can trace, whatever Scaliger 10 the father, or Heinsius, may have seen, or rather think they had seen. I have taken up, laid down, and resumed as often as I pleased, the same subject ; and this loose proceeding I shall use through all this prefatory Dedication. Yet all this while I have been sailing with 15 some side-wind or other toward the point I proposed in the beginning, the greatness and excellency of a Heroic Poem, with some of the difficulties which attend that work. The comparison, therefore, which I made betwixt the Epopæe and the Tragedy was not altogether 20 a digression ; for 'tis concluded on all hands that they are both the master-pieces of human wit.

In the meantime, I may be bold to draw this corollary from what has been already said, that the file of heroic poets is very short ; all are not such who have assumed 25 that lofty title in ancient or modern ages, or have been so esteemed by their partial and ignorant admirers.

There have been but one great Ilias and one Æneis in so many ages. The next, but the next with a long interval betwixt, was the Jerusalem : I mean not so 30 much in distance of time, as in excellency. After these three are entered, some Lord Chamberlain should be appointed, some critic of authority should be set before the door, to keep out a crowd of little poets, who press for admission, and are not of quality. Mævius would 35 be deafening your Lordship's ears with his

Fortunam Priami cantabo, et nobile bellum ;

mere fustian, as Horace would tell you from behind, without pressing forward, and more smoke than fire. Pulci, Boiardo, and Ariosto, would cry out, 'make room for the Italian poets, the descendants of Virgil in a right line : ' Father Le Moine, with his Saint Louis, and Scudery with his Alaric, for a godly king and a Gothic conqueror ; and Chapelain would take it ill that his Maid should be refused a place with Helen and Lavinia. Spenser has a better plea for his Fairy Queen, had his action been finished, or had been one. And Milton, if the Devil had not been his hero, instead of Adam ; if the giant had not foiled the knight, and driven him out of his stronghold, to wander through the world with his lady errant ; and if there had not been more machining persons than human in his poem. After these, the rest of our English poets shall not be mentioned. I have that honour for them which I ought to have ; but, if they are worthies, they are not to be ranked amongst the three whom I have named, and who are established in their reputation. 5 10 15 20

Before I quitted the comparison betwixt Epic Poetry and Tragedy, I should have acquainted my judge with one advantage of the former over the latter, which I now casually remember out of the preface of Segrais before his translation of the Æneis, or out of Bossu, no matter which : the style of the Heroic Poem is, and ought to be, more lofty than that of the drama. The critic is certainly in the right, for the reason already urged ; the work of Tragedy is on the passions, and in dialogue ; both of them abhor strong metaphors, in which the Epopee delights. A poet cannot speak too plainly on the stage : for volat irrevocabile verbum ; the sense is lost, if it be not taken flying. But what we read alone, we have leisure to digest ; there an author may beautify his 25 30 35 sense by the boldness of his expression, which if we understand not fully at the first, we may dwell upon it till we find the secret force and excellence. That which cures the manners by alterative physic, as I said before, 5 must proceed by insensible degrees; but that which purges the passions must do its business all at once, or wholly fail of its effect, at least in the present operation, and without repeated doses. We must beat the iron while it is hot, but we may polish it at leisure. Thus, 10 my Lord, you pay the fine of my forgetfulness; and yet the merits of both causes are where they were, and undecided, till you declare whether it be more for the benefit of mankind to have their manners in general corrected, or their pride and hard-heartedness removed. 15 I must now come closer to my present business, and not think of making more invasive wars abroad, when, like Hannibal, I am called back to the defence of my own country. Virgil is attacked by many enemies; he has a whole confederacy against him; and I must 20 endeavour to defend him as well as I am able. But their principal objections being against his moral, the duration or length of time taken up in the action of the poem, and what they have to urge against the manners of his hero, I shall omit the rest as mere 25 cavils of grammarians; at the worst, but casual slips of a great man's pen, or inconsiderable faults of an admirable poem, which the author had not leisure to review before his death. Macrobius has answered what the ancients could urge against him; and some 30 things I have lately read in Tanneguy le Fèvre, Valois, and another whom I name not, which are scarce worth answering. They begin with the moral of his poem, which I have elsewhere confessed, and still must own, not to be so noble as that of Homer. But let both be 35 fairly stated; and, without contradicting my first opinion,

I can show that Virgil's was as useful to the Romans of his age, as Homer's was to the Grecians of his, in what time soever he may be supposed to have lived and flourished. Homer's moral was to urge the necessity of union, and of a good understanding betwixt confederate states and princes engaged in a war with a mighty monarch; as also of discipline in an army, and obedience in the several chiefs to the supreme commander of the joint forces. To inculcate this, he sets forth the ruinous effects of discord in the camp of those allies, occasioned by the quarrel betwixt the general and one of the next in office under him. Agamemnon gives the provocation, and Achilles resents the injury. Both parties are faulty in the quarrel; and accordingly they are both punished: the aggressor is forced to sue for peace to his inferior on dishonourable conditions: the deserter refuses the satisfaction offered, and his obstinacy costs him his best friend. This works the natural effect of choler, and turns his rage against him by whom he was last affronted, and most sensibly. The greater anger expels the less; but his character is still preserved. In the meantime, the Grecian army receives loss on loss, and is half destroyed by a pestilence into the bargain:—

Quidquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.

25

As the poet, in the first part of the example, had shown the bad effects of discord, so, after the reconciliation, he gives the good effects of unity; for Hector is slain, and then Troy must fall. By this it is probable that Homer lived when the Persian Monarchy was grown formidable to the Grecians, and that the joint endeavours of his countrymen were little enough to preserve their common freedom from an encroaching enemy. Such was his moral, which all critics have allowed to be more noble than that of Virgil, though not adapted to the times in which the Roman poet lived. Had Virgil flourished in the age of Ennius, and addressed to Scipio, he had probably taken the same moral, or some other not unlike it: for then the Romans were in as much danger from the Carthaginian commonwealth as the Grecians were from the Persian monarchy. But we are to consider him as writing his poem in a time when the old form of government was subverted, and a new one just established by Octavius Cæsar, in effect by force of arms, but seemingly by the consent of the Roman people. The Commonwealth had received a deadly wound in the former civil wars betwixt Marius and Sylla. The commons, while the first prevailed, had almost shaken off the yoke of the nobility; and Marius and Cinna, like the captains of the mob, under the specious pretence of the public good, and of doing justice on the oppressors of their liberty, revenged themselves, without form of law, on their private enemies. Sylla, in his turn, proscribed the heads of the adverse party: he too had nothing but liberty and reformation in his mouth; (for the cause of religion is but a modern motive to rebellion, invented by the Christian priesthood, refining on the heathen;) Sylla, to be sure, meant no more good to the Roman people than Marius before him, whatever he declared; but sacrificed the lives, and took the estates, of all his enemies, to gratify those who brought him into power. Such was the reformation of the government by both parties. The Senate and the Commons were the two bases on which it stood; and the two champions of either faction, each, destroyed the foundations of the other side; so the fabric, of consequence, must fall betwixt them, and tyranny must be built upon their ruins. This comes of altering fundamental laws and constitutions; like him, who, being in good health, lodged himself in a physician's house, and was overpersuaded by his landlord to take physic (of which he died), for the benefit of his doctor. Stavo ben (was 5 written on his monument), ma, per star meglio, sto qui.

After the death of those two usurpers, the Commonwealth seemed to recover, and held up its head for a little time. But it was all the while in a deep consumption, which is a flattering disease. Pompey, 10 Crassus, and Cæsar had found the sweets of arbitrary power; and, each being a check to the other's growth, struck up a false friendship amongst themselves, and divided the government betwixt them, which none of them was able to assume alone. These were the public- 15 spirited men of their age; that is, patriots for their own interest. The Commonwealth looked with a florid countenance in their management, spread in bulk, and all the while was wasting in the vitals. Not to trouble your Lordship with the repetition of what you know: 20 after the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar, broke with him, overpowered him in the Senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him. Cæsar, thus injured, and unable to resist the faction of the nobles which was now uppermost (for 25 he was a Marian), had recourse to arms; and his cause was just against Pompey, but not against his country, whose constitution ought to have been sacred to him, and never to have been violated on the account of any private wrong. But he prevailed; and Heaven declar- 30 ing for him, he became a providential monarch, under the title of perpetual dictator. He being murdered by his own son, whom I neither dare commend, nor can justly blame (though Dante, in his Inferno, has put him and Cassius, and Judas Iscariot betwixt them, into the 35 great Devil's mouth), the Commonwealth popped up its head for the third time, under Brutus and Cassius, and then sunk for ever.

Thus the Roman people were grossly gulled twice or 5 thrice over, and as often enslaved in one century, and under the same pretence of reformation. At last the two battles of Philippi gave the decisive stroke against liberty; and, not long after, the Commonwealth was turned into a Monarchy by the conduct and good fortune
10 of Augustus. 'Tis true, that the despotic power could not have fallen into better hands than those of the first and second Cæsar. Your Lordship well knows what obligations Virgil had to the latter of them: he saw, beside, that the Commonwealth was lost without 15 resource; the heads of it destroyed; the Senate new moulded, grown degenerate, and either bought off, or thrusting their own necks into the yoke, out of fear of being forced. Yet I may safely affirm for our great author (as men of good sense are generally honest), that 20 he was still of republic principles in his heart.

Secretosque pios, his dantem jura Catonem.

I think I need use no other argument to justify my opinion, than that of this one line, taken from the Eighth Book of the Æneis. If he had not well studied 25 his patron's temper, it might have ruined him with another prince. But Augustus was not discontented, at least that we can find, that Cato was placed, by his own poet, in Elysium, and there giving laws to the holy souls who deserved to be separated from the 30 vulgar sort of good spirits; for his conscience could not but whisper to the arbitrary Monarch that the Kings of Rome were at first elective, and governed not without a Senate; that Romulus was no hereditary prince; and though, after his death, he received divine honours for the good he did on earth, yet he was but a god of their own making; that the last Tarquin was expelled justly for overt acts of tyranny, and mal-administration; for such are the conditions of an elective kingdom: and I meddle not with others, being, 5 for my own opinion, of Montaigne's principles, that an honest man ought to be contented with that form of government, and with those fundamental constitutions of it, which he received from his ancestors, and under which himself was born; though at the same 10 time he confessed freely, that, if he could have chosen his place of birth, it should have been at Venice; which, for many reasons, I dislike, and am better pleased to have been born an Englishman.

But, to return from my long rambling: I say, that 15 Virgil having maturely weighed the condition of the times in which he lived; that an entire liberty was not to be retrieved; that the present settlement had the prospect of a long continuance in the same family, or those adopted into it; that he held his paternal 20 estate from the bounty of the conqueror, by whom he was likewise enriched, esteemed and cherished; that this conqueror, though of a bad kind, was the very best of it; that the arts of peace flourished under him; that all men might be happy, if they would be quiet; 25 that, now he was in possession of the whole, yet he shared a great part of his authority with the Senate; that he would be chosen into the ancient offices of the Commonwealth, and ruled by the power which he derived from them; and prorogued his government 30 from time to time, still, as it were, threatening to dismiss himself from public cares, which he exercised more for the common good than for any delight he took in greatness; these things, I say, being considered by the poet, he concluded it to be the interest of his 35 country to be so governed ; to infuse an awful respect into the people towards such a prince ; by that respect to confirm their obedience to him, and by that obedience to make them happy. This was the moral of his divine poem ; honest in the poet ; honourable to the Emperor, whom he derives from a divine extraction ; and reflecting part of that honour on the Roman people, whom he derives also from the Trojans ; and not only profitable, but necessary, to the present age, and likely to be such to their posterity. That it was the received opinion, that the Romans were descended from the Trojans, and Julius Cæsar from Iulus the son of Æneas, was enough for Virgil ; though perhaps he thought not so himself, or that Æneas ever was in Italy ; which Bochartus manifestly proves. And Homer, where he says that Jupiter hated the house of Priam, and was resolved to transfer the kingdom to the family of Æneas, yet mentions nothing of his leading a colony into a foreign country, and settling there. But that the Romans valued themselves on their Trojan ancestry is so undoubted a truth that I need not prove it. Even the seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them (though they were all graven after his death), as a note that he was deified. I doubt not but it was one reason why Augustus should be so passionately concerned for the preservation of the Æneis, which its author had condemned to be burnt, as an imperfect poem, by his last will and testament, because it did him a real service, as well as an honour ; that a work should not be lost where his divine original was celebrated in verse which had the character of immortality stamped upon it.

Neither were the great Roman families, which flourished in his time, less obliged by him than the Emperor. Your Lordship knows with what address he makes mention of them, as captains of ships, or leaders in the war; and even some of Italian extraction are not forgotten. These are the single stars which are sprinkled through the Æneis: but there are whole 5 constellations of them in the Fifth Book. And I could not but take notice, when I translated it, of some favourite families to which he gives the victory and awards the prizes, in the person of his hero, at the funeral games which were celebrated in honour of 10 Anchises. I insist not on their names; but am pleased to find the Memmii amongst them, derived from Mnes-theus, because Lucretius dedicates to one of that family, a branch of which destroyed Corinth. I likewise either found or formed an image to myself of the contrary 15 kind; that those who lost the prizes were such as had disoblged the poet, or were in disgrace with Augustus, or enemies to Mæcenus; and this was the poetical revenge he took: for genus irritabile vatum, as Horace says. When a poet is thoroughly provoked, he will 20 do himself justice, however dear it cost him; animamque in vulnere ponit. I think these are not bare imaginations of my own, though I find no trace of them in the commentators; but one poet may judge of another by himself. The vengeance we defer is not forgotten. 25 I hinted before that the whole Roman people were obliged by Virgil, in deriving them from Troy; an ancestry which they affected. We and the French are of the same humour: they would be thought to descend from a son, I think, of Hector; and we would have our 30 Britain both named and planted by a descendant of Æneas. Spenser favours this opinion what he can. His Prince Arthur, or whoever he intends by him, is a Trojan. Thus the hero of Homer was a Grecian, of Virgil a Roman, of Tasso an Italian. 35

I have transgressed my bounds, and gone further than the moral led me. But if your Lordship is not tired, I am safe enough.

Thus far, I think, my author is defended. But, as 5 Augustus is still shadowed in the person of Æneas, of which I shall say more when I come to the manners which the poet gives his hero, I must prepare that subject by showing how dexterously he managed both the prince and people, so as to displease neither, and to 10 do good to both; which is the part of a wise and an honest man, and proves that it is possible for a courtier not to be a knave. I shall continue still to speak my thoughts like a free-born subject, as I am; though such things, perhaps, as no Dutch commentator could, and 15 I am sure no Frenchman durst. I have already told your Lordship my opinion of Virgil, that he was no arbitrary man. Obliged he was to his master for his bounty; and he repays him with good counsel, how to behave himself in his new monarchy, so as to gain the 20 affections of his subjects, and deserve to be called the Father of his Country. From this consideration it is that he chose, for the ground-work of his poem, one empire destroyed, and another raised from the ruins of it. This was just the parallel. Æneas could not 25 pretend to be Priam's heir in a lineal succession; for Anchises, the hero's father, was only of the second branch of the royal family; and Helenus, a son of Priam, was yet surviving, and might lawfully claim before him. It may be, Virgil mentions him on that 30 account. Neither has he forgotten Priamus, in the fifth of his Æneis, the son of Polites, youngest son to Priam, who was slain by Pyrrhus, in the Second Book. Æneas had only married Creusa, Priam's daughter, and by her could have no title while any of the male issue 35 were remaining. In this case, the poet gave him the next title, which is that of an elective king. The remaining Trojans chose him to lead them forth, and settle them in some foreign country. Ilioneus, in his speech to Dido, calls him expressly by the name of king. Our poet, who all this while had Augustus in 5 his eye, had no desire he should seem to succeed by any right of inheritance derived from Julius Cæsar (such a title being but one degree removed from conquest), for what was introduced by force, by force may be removed. 'Twas better for the people that they 10 should give, than he should take; since that gift was indeed no more at bottom than a trust. Virgil gives us an example of this in the person of Mezentius: he governed arbitrarily; he was expelled, and came to the deserved end of all tyrants. Our author shows 15 us another sort of kingship, in the person of Latinus: he was descended from Saturn, and, as I remember, in the third degree. He is described a just and gracious prince, solicitous for the welfare of his people, always consulting with his Senate to promote the 20 common good. We find him at the head of them, when he enters into the council-hall, speaking first, but still demanding their advice, and steering by it, as far as the iniquity of the times would suffer him. And this is the proper character of a King by 25 inheritance, who is born a Father of his Country. Æneas, though he married the heiress of the crown, yet claimed no title to it during the life of his father-in-law. Pater arma Latinus habeto, &c. are Virgil's words. As for himself, he was contented to take care 30 of his country gods, who were not those of Latium; wherein our divine author seems to relate to the after-practice of the Romans, which was to adopt the gods of those they conquered, or received as members of their commonwealth. Yet, withal, he plainly touches 35 at the office of the high-priesthood, with which Augustus was invested, and which made his person more sacred and inviolable than even the tribunitial power. It was not therefore for nothing, that the most judicious of all 5 poets made that office vacant by the death of Panthus in the Second Book of the Æneis, for his hero to succeed in it, and consequently for Augustus to enjoy. I know not that any of the commentators have taken notice of that passage. If they have not, I am sure they ought;

 10 and if they have, I am not indebted to them for the observation. The words of Virgil are very plain:—

Sacra, suosque tibi commendat Troja penates.

As for Augustus, or his uncle Julius, claiming by descent from Æneas, that title is already out of doors.
 15 Æneas succeeded not, but was elected. Troy was foredoomed to fall for ever:—

Postquam res Asiæ Priamique evertere gentem Immeritam visum superis.—ÆNEIS iii. line 1.

Augustus, 'tis true, had once resolved to rebuild that 20 city, and there to make the seat of empire: but Horace writes an ode on purpose to deter him from that thought; declaring the place to be accursed, and that the gods would as often destroy it as it should be raised. Hereupon the Emperor laid aside a project so ungrateful to 25 the Roman people. But by this, my Lord, we may conclude that he had still his pedigree in his head, and had an itch of being thought a divine king, if his poets had not given him better counsel.

I will pass by many less material objections, for want 30 of room to answer them: what follows next is of great importance, if the critics can make out their charge; for 'tis levelled at the manners which our poet gives his hero, and which are the same which were eminently seen in his Augustus. Those manners were, piety to the gods and a dutiful affection to his father, love to his relations, care of his people, courage and conduct in the wars, grâtitude to those who had obliged him, and justice in general to mankind. 5

Piety, as your Lordship sees, takes place of all, as the chief part of his character; and the word in Latin is more full than it can possibly be expressed in any modern language; for there it comprehends not only devotion to the gods, but filial love, and tender affection to relations of all sorts. As instances of this, the deities of Troy, and his own Penates, are made the companions of his flight: they appear to him in his voyage, and advise him; and at last he replaces them in Italy, their native country. For his father, he takes him on his 15 back: he leads his little son: his wife follows him; but, losing his footsteps through fear or ignorance, he goes back into the midst of his enemies to find her, and leaves not his pursuit until her ghost appears, to forbid his further search. I will say nothing of his 20 duty to his father while he lived, his sorrow for his death, of the games instituted in honour of his memory, or seeking him, by his command, even after his death, in the Elysian fields. I will not mention his tenderness for his son, which everywhere is visible—of his raising 25 a tomb for Polydorus, the obsequies for Misenus, his pious remembrance of Deiphobus, the funerals of his nurse, his grief for Pallas, and his revenge taken on his murderer, whom otherwise, by his natural compassion, he had forgiven: and then the poem had been 30 left imperfect; for we could have had no certain prospect of his happiness, while the last obstacle to it was removed. Of the other parts which compose his character, as a king or as a general, I need say nothing; the whole Æneis is one continued instance of some one 35 or other of them ; and where I find anything of them taxed, it shall suffice me, as briefly as I can, to vindicate my divine master to your Lordship, and by you to the reader. But herein Segrais, in his admirable preface to his translation of the Æneis, as the author of the Dauphin's Virgil justly calls it, has prevented me. Him I follow, and what I borrow from him, am ready to acknowledge to him. For, impartially speaking, the French are as much better critics than the English, as they are worse poets. Thus we generally allow, that they better understand the management of a war than our islanders ; but we know we are superior to them in the day of battle. They value themselves on their generals, we on our soldiers. But this is not the proper place to decide that question, if they make it one. I shall say perhaps as much of other nations, and their poets, excepting only Tasso ; and hope to make my assertion good, which is but doing justice to my country ; part of which honour will reflect on your Lordship, whose thoughts are always just ; your numbers harmonious, your words chosen, your expressions strong and manly, your verse flowing, and your turns as happy as they are easy. If you would set us more copies, your example would make all precepts needless. In the mean time, that little you have written is owned, and that particularly by the poets (who are a nation not over lavish of praise to their contemporaries), as a principal ornament of our language ; but the sweetest essences are always confined in the smallest glasses.

When I speak of your Lordship, 'tis never a digression, and therefore I need beg no pardon for it ; but take up Segrais where I left him, and shall use him less often than I have occasion for him ; for his preface is a perfect piece of criticism, full and clear, and digested into an exact method ; mine is loose, and, as I intended it, epistolary. Yet I dwell on many things which he durst not touch ; for 'tis dangerous to offend an arbitrary master ; and every patron who has the power of Augustus has not his clemency. In short, my Lord, 5 I would not translate him, because I would bring you somewhat of my own. His notes and observations on every book are of the same excellency ; and, for the same reason, I omit the greater part.

He takes notice that Virgil is arraigned for placing 10 piety before valour, and making that piety the chief character of his hero. I have said already from Bossu, that a poet is not obliged to make his hero a virtuous man ; therefore, neither Homer nor Tasso are to be blamed for giving what predominant quality they 15 pleased to their first character. But Virgil, who designed to form a perfect prince, and would insinuate that Augustus, whom he calls Æneas in his poem, was truly such, found himself obliged to make him without blemish, thoroughly virtuous ; and a thorough virtue 20 both begins and ends in piety. Tasso, without question, observed this before me, and therefore split his hero in two : he gave Godfrey piety, and Rinaldo fortitude, for their chief qualities or manners. Homer, who had chosen another moral, makes both Agamemnon 25 and Achilles vicious ; for his design was to instruct in virtue, by showing the deformity of vice. I avoid repetition of what I have said above. What follows is translated literally from Segrais.

'Virgil had considered, that the greatest virtues of 30 Augustus consisted in the perfect art of governing his people ; which caused him to reign for more than forty years in great felicity. He considered that his emperor was valiant, civil, popular, eloquent, politic, and religious ; he has given all these qualities to Æneas. But, 35

knowing that piety alone comprehends the whole duty of man towards the gods, towards his country, and towards his relations, he judged that this ought to be his first character, whom he would set for a pattern of 5 perfection. In reality, they who believe that the praises which arise from valour are superior to those which proceed from any other virtues, have not considered (as they ought), that valour, destitute of other virtues, cannot render a man worthy of any true esteem. That
10 quality, which signifies no more than an intrepid courage, may be separated from many others which are good, and accompanied with many which are ill. A man may be very valiant, and yet impious and vicious. But the same cannot be said of piety, which excludes 15 all ill qualities, and comprehends even valour itself, with all other qualities which are good. Can we, for example, give the praise of valour to a man who should see his gods profaned, and should want the courage to defend them? to a man who should abandon his father, 20 or desert his king, in his last necessity?'

Thus far Segrays, in giving the preference to piety before valour. I will now follow him, where he considers this valour, or intrepid courage, singly in itself; and this also Virgil gives to his Æneas, and that in 25 a heroical degree.

Having first concluded, that our poet did for the best in taking the first character of his hero from that essential virtue on which the rest depend, he proceeds to tell us that in the ten years' war of Troy he was con-30 sidered as the second champion of his country, allowing Hector the first place; and this, even by the confession of Homer, who took all occasions of setting up his own countrymen the Grecians, and of undervaluing the Trojan chiefs. But Virgil (whom Segrays forgot to 35 cite) makes Diomedes give him a higher character for strength and courage. His testimony is this, in the Eleventh Book :—

... *Stetimus tela aspera contra,
Contulimusque manus: experto credite, quantus
In clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torqueat hastam.* 5
*Si duo præterea tales Idæa tulisset
Terra viros, ultro Inachias venisset ad urbes Dardanus, et versis lugeret Græcia fatis.
Quicquid apud duræ cessatum est mania Trojæ,
Hectoris Æneæque manu victoria Graium* 10
*Hasit, et in decumum vestigia rettulit annum.
Ambo animis, ambo insignes præstantibus armis:
Hic pietate prior . . .*

I give not here my translation of these verses, though I think I have not ill succeeded in them, because your Lordship is so great a master of the original, that I have no reason to desire you should see Virgil and me so near together; but you may please, my Lord, to take notice, that the Latin author refines upon the Greek, and insinuates that Homer had done his hero wrong in giving the advantage of the duel to his own countryman; though Diomedes was manifestly the second champion of the Grecians; and Ulysses preferred him before Ajax, when he chose him for the companion of his nightly expedition; for he had a headpiece of his own, and wanted only the fortitude of another, to bring him off with safety, and that he might compass his design with honour.

The French translator thus proceeds: 'They, who accuse Æneas for want of courage, either understand not Virgil, or have read him slightly; otherwise they would not raise an objection so easily to be answered.' Hereupon he gives so many instances of the hero's valour, that to repeat them after him would tire your Lordship, and put me to the unnecessary trouble of transcribing the greatest part of the three last Æneids.

In short, more could not be expected from an Amadis, a Sir Lancelot, or the whole Round Table, than he performs. Proxima quæque metit gladio, is the perfect account of a knight-errant. 'If it be replied,' continues 5 Segrals, 'that it was not difficult for him to undertake and achieve such hardy enterprises, because he wore enchanted arms; that accusation, in the first place, must fall on Homer, ere it can reach Virgil.' Achilles was as well provided with them as Æneas, though he
10 was invulnerable without them. And Ariosto, the two Tasso's, Bernardo and Torquato, even our own Spenser, in a word, all modern poets, have copied Homer as well as Virgil: he is neither the first nor last, but in the midst of them; and therefore is safe, if they are so.
15 'Who knows,' says Segrals, 'but that his fated armour was only an allegorical defence, and signified no more than that he was under the peculiar protection of the gods?—born, as the astrologers will tell us out of Virgil (who was well versed in the Chaldean mysteries),
20 under the favourable influence of Jupiter, Venus, and the Sun.' But I insist not on this, because I know you believe not there is such an art; though not only Horace and Persius, but Augustus himself, thought otherwise. But, in defence of Virgil, I dare positively 25 say, that he has been more cautious in this particular than either his predecessor, or his descendants: for Æneas was actually wounded, in the Twelfth of the Æneis; though he had the same God-smith to forge his arms as had Achilles. It seems he was no warluck, as 30 the Scots commonly call such men, who, they say, are iron-free, or lead-free. Yet, after this experiment, that his arms were not impenetrable, when he was cured indeed by his mother's help, because he was that day to conclude the war by the death of Turnus, the poet wholly to his former vigour: he was still too weak to overtake his enemy; yet we see with what courage he attacks Turnus, when he faces and renews the combat. I need say no more; for Virgil defends himself without needing my assistance, and proves his hero truly to 5 deserve that name. He was not then a second-rate champion, as they would have him, who think fortitude the first virtue in a hero. But, being beaten from this hold, they will not yet allow him to be valiant, because he wept more often, as they think, than well becomes 10 a man of courage.
35 durst not carry the miracle too far, and restore him

In the first place, if tears are arguments of cowardice, what shall I say of Homer's hero? Shall Achilles pass for timorous because he wept, and wept on less occasions than Æneas? Herein Virgil must be granted 15 to have excelled his master. For once both heroes are described lamenting their lost loves: Briseis was taken away by force from the Grecians; Creusa was lost for ever to her husband. But Achilles went roaring along the salt sea-shore, and, like a booby, was complaining 20 to his mother, when he should have revenged his injury by arms. Æneas took a nobler course; for, having secured his father and his son, he repeated all his former dangers, to have found his wife, if she had been above ground. And here your Lordship may observe 25 the address of Virgil; it was not for nothing that this passage was related with all these tender circumstances. Æneas told it; Dido heard it. That he had been so affectionate a husband was no ill argument to the coming dowager, that he might prove as kind to her. Virgil 30 has a thousand secret beauties, though I have not leisure to remark them.

Segrais, on this subject of a hero shedding tears, observes, that historians commend Alexander for weeping when he read the mighty actions of Achilles; and 35

Julius Cæsar is likewise praised, when, out of the same noble envy, he wept at the victories of Alexander. But, if we observe more closely, we shall find that the tears of Æneas were always on a laudable occasion. Thus 5 he weeps out of compassion and tenderness of nature, when, in the temple of Carthage, he beholds the pictures of his friends, who sacrificed their lives in defence of their country. He deplores the lamentable end of his pilot Palinurus, the untimely death of young Pallas 10 his confederate, and the rest, which I omit. Yet, even for these tears, his wretched critics dare condemn him. They make Æneas little better than a kind of St. Swithin hero, always raining. One of these censors is bold enough to argue him of cowardice, when, in the 15 beginning of the First Book, he not only weeps, but trembles, at an approaching storm—

Extemplo Æneæ solvuntur frigore membra :

Ingemit ; et duplices tendens ad sidera palmas, &c.

But to this I have answered formerly, that his fear
 20 was not for himself, but for his people. And what can give a sovereign a better commendation, or recommend a hero more to the affection of the reader? They were threatened with a tempest, and he wept; he was promised Italy, and therefore he prayed for the accom-
 25 plishment of that promise. All this in the beginning of a storm; therefore he showed the more early piety, and the quicker sense of compassion. Thus much I have urged elsewhere in the defence of Virgil; and, since, I have been informed by Mr. Moyle, a young 30 gentleman whom I can never sufficiently commend, that the Ancients accounted drowning an accursed death; so that, if we grant him to have been afraid, he had just occasion for that fear, both in relation to himself and to his subjects. I think our adversaries can carry this argument no further, unless they tell us, that he ought to have had more confidence in the promise of the gods ; but how was he assured that he had understood their oracles aright ? Helenus might be mistaken ; Phœbus might speak doubtfully ; even his mother might flatter ; him, that he might prosecute his voyage, which if it succeeded happily, he should be the founder of an empire ; for, that she herself was doubtful of his fortune, is apparent by the address she made to Jupiter on his behalf ; to which the god makes answer in these 10 words—

Parce metu, Cytherea : manent immota tuorum Fata tibi, &c.—

notwithstanding which, the goddess, though comforted, was not assured ; for, even after this, through the course 15 of the whole Æneis, she still apprehends the interest which Juno might make with Jupiter against her son. For it was a moot point in heaven, whether he could alter Fate, or not. And indeed some passages in Virgil would make us suspect that he was of opinion Jupiter 20 might defer Fate, though he could not alter it ; for, in the latter end of the Tenth Book, he introduces Juno begging for the life of Turnus, and flattering her husband with the power of changing destiny : Tua, qui potes, orsa reflectas ! To which he graciously 25 answers—

*Si mora præsentis leti, tempusque caduco
Oratur juveni, meque hoc ita ponere sentis, Tolle fuga Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fatis.
Hactenus indulgisse vacat. Sin altior istis
Sub precibus venia ulla latet, totumque moveri
Mutarive putas bellum, spes pascis inanes.*

30

But, that he could not alter those decrees, the king of gods himself confesses, in the book above cited, when he comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, 35 who had invoked his aid, before he threw his lance at Turnus—

... Trojæ sub manibus altis,
Tot nati cecidere dum; quin occidit una 5 Sarpedon, mea progenies. Etiam sua Turnum
Fata manent, metasque dati pervenit ad ævi.

Where he plainly acknowledges that he could not save his own son, or prevent the death which he foresaw. Of his power to defer the blow, I once occasionally 10 discoursed with that excellent person Sir Robert Howard, who is better conversant, than any man that I know, in the doctrine of the Stoics; and he set me right, from the concurrent testimony of philosophers and poets, that Jupiter could not retard the effects of 15 Fate, even for a moment. For, when I cited Virgil, as favouring the contrary opinion in that verse, Tolle fuga Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fati...

he replied, and, I think, with exact judgment, that, when Jupiter gave Juno leave to withdraw Turnus 20 from the present danger, it was because he certainly foreknew that his fatal hour was not come; that it was in Destiny for Juno at that time to save him; and that he himself obeyed Destiny, in giving her that leave.

I need say no more in justification of our hero's
 25 courage, and am much deceived if he ever be attacked on this side of his character again. But he is arraigned with more show of reason by the ladies, who will make a numerous party against him, for being false to love, in forsaking Dido. And I cannot much blame them;
 30 for, to say the truth, it is an ill precedent for their gallants to follow. Yet, if I can bring him off with flying colours, they may learn experience at her cost, and, for her sake, avoid a cave, as the worst shelter they can choose from a shower of rain, especially when 35 they have a lover in their company.

In the first place, Segrais observes with much acuteness, that they who blame Æneas for his insensibility of love when he left Carthage, contradict their former accusation of him, for being always crying, compassionate, and effeminately sensible of those misfortunes 5 which befell others. They give him two contrary characters; but Virgil makes him of a piece, always grateful, always tender-hearted. But they are impudent enough to discharge themselves of this blunder, by laying the contradiction at Virgil's door. He, say they, 10 has shown his hero with these inconsistent characters, acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted, but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested. For Dido had not only received his weather-beaten troops before she saw him, and given them her protection, but had also offered them an equal share in 15 her dominion—

*Vultis et his mecum pariter considerare regnis?
Urbem quam statuo, vestra est.*

This was an obligation never to be forgotten; and 20 the more to be considered, because antecedent to her love. That passion, 'tis true, produced the usual effects, of generosity, gallantry, and care to please; and thither we refer them. But when she had made all these advances it was still in his power to have 25 refused them; after the intrigue of the cave (call it marriage, or enjoyment only), he was no longer free to take or leave; he had accepted the favour, and was obliged to be constant, if he would be grateful.

My Lord, I have set this argument in the best light 30 I can, that the ladies may not think I write booty; and perhaps it may happen to me, as it did to Dr. Cudworth, who has raised such strong objections against the being of a God, and Providence, that many think he has not answered them. You may please at least 35 to hear the adverse party. Segrais pleads for Virgil, that no less than an absolute command from Jupiter could excuse this insensibility of the hero, and this abrupt departure, which looks so like extreme ingratitude. But, at the same time, he does wisely to remember you, that Virgil had made piety the first character of Æneas; and this being allowed, as I am afraid it must, he was obliged, antecedent to all other considerations, to search an asylum for his Gods in Italy; for those very Gods, I say, who had promised to his race the universal empire. Could a pious man dispense with the commands of Jupiter, to satisfy his passion? or take it in the strongest sense, to comply with the obligations of his gratitude? Religion, 'tis true, must have moral honesty for its ground-work, or we shall be apt to suspect its truth; but an immediate revelation dispenses with all duties of morality. All casuists agree that theft is a breach of the moral law; yet, if I might presume to mingle things sacred with profane, the Israelites only spoiled the Egyptians, not robbed them; because the propriety was transferred, by a revelation to their law-giver. I confess Dido was a very infidel in this point; for she would not believe, as Virgil makes her say, that ever Jupiter would send Mercury on such an immoral errand. But this needs no answer, at least no more than Virgil gives it:—

Fata obstant; placidasque viri Deus obstruit aures.

This notwithstanding, as Segrais confesses, he might have shown a little more sensibility when he left her; for that had been according to his character.

But let Virgil answer for himself. He still loved her, and struggled with his inclinations to obey the Gods—

... Curam sub corde premebat,

35 Multa gemens, magnoque animum labefactus amore.

Upon the whole matter, and humanly speaking, I doubt there was a fault somewhere; and Jupiter is better able to bear the blame, than either Virgil or Æneas. The poet, it seems, had found it out, and therefore brings the deserting hero and the forsaken lady to meet together in the lower regions, where he excuses himself when 'tis too late; and accordingly she will take no satisfaction, nor so much as hear him. Now Segrais is forced to abandon his defence, and excuses his author by saying that the Æneis is an imperfect work, and that death prevented the divine poet from reviewing it; and for that reason he had condemned it to the fire; though, at the same time, his two translators must acknowledge that the Sixth Book is the most correct of the whole Æneis. Oh, how convenient is a machine sometimes in a heroic poem! This of Mercury is plainly one; and Virgil was constrained to use it here, or the honesty of his hero would be ill-defended. And the fair sex, however, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shown him no more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus: for if too much constancy may be a fault sometimes, then want of constancy, and ingratitude after the last favour, is a crime that never will be forgiven. But, of machines, more in their proper place; where I shall show, with how much judgment they have been used by Virgil; and, in the mean time, pass to another article of his defence, on the present subject; where, if I cannot clear the hero, I hope at least to bring off the poet; for here I must divide their causes. Let Æneas trust to his machine, which will only help to break his fall; but the address is incomparable. Plato, who borrowed so much from Homer, and yet concluded for the banishment of all poets, would at least have rewarded Virgil before he sent him into exile. But

I go further, and say, that he ought to be acquitted, and deserved, beside, the bounty of Augustus, and the gratitude of the Roman people. If, after this, the ladies will stand out, let them remember that the jury is not
5 all agreed; for Octavia was of his party, and was of the first quality in Rome; she was present at the reading of the Sixth Æneid: and we know not that she condemned Æneas; but we are sure she presented the poet for his admirable elegy on her son Marcellus.

10 But let us consider the secret reasons which Virgil had for thus framing this noble episode, wherein the whole passion of love is more exactly described than in any other poet. Love was the theme of his Fourth Book; and, though it is the shortest of the whole
15 Æneis, yet there he has given its beginning, its progress, its traverses, and its conclusion; and had exhausted so entirely this subject, that he could resume it but very slightly in the eight ensuing books.

She was warmed with the graceful appearance of 20 the hero; she smothered those sparkles out of decency; but conversation blew them up into a flame. Then she was forced to make a confidant of her whom she best might trust, her own sister, who approves the passion, and thereby augments it; then succeeds her public
25 owning it; and, after that, the consummation. Of Venus and Juno, Jupiter and Mercury, I say nothing; for they were all machining work; but, possession having cooled his love, as it increased hers, she soon perceived the change, or at least grew suspicious of 30 a change; this suspicion soon turned to jealousy, and jealousy to rage; then she disdains and threatens, and again is humble, and entreats, and, nothing availing, despairs, curses, and at last becomes her own executioner. See here the whole process of that 35 passion, to which nothing can be added. I dare go

no further, lest I should lose the connexion of my discourse.

To love our native country, and to study its benefit and its glory, to be interested in its concerns, is natural to all men, and is indeed our common duty. A poet makes a further step; for endeavouring to do honour to it, 'tis allowable in him even to be partial in its cause; for he is not tied to truth, or fettered by the laws of history. Homer and Tasso are justly praised for choosing their heroes out of Greece and Italy; 10 Virgil indeed made his a Trojan; but it was to derive the Romans and his own Augustus from him. But all the three poets are manifestly partial to their heroes, in favour of their country; for Dares Phrygius reports of Hector that he was slain cowardly; Æneas, according 15 to the best account, slew not Mezentius, but was slain by him; and the chronicles of Italy tell us little of that Rinaldo d'Este who conquers Jerusalem in Tasso. He might be a champion of the Church; but we know not that he was so much as present at the siege. To 20 apply this to Virgil, he thought himself engaged in honour to espouse the cause and quarrel of his country against Carthage. He knew he could not please the Romans better, or oblige them more to patronize his poem, than by disgracing the foundress of that city. 25 He shows her ungrateful to the memory of her first husband, doting on a stranger; enjoyed, and afterwards forsaken, by him. This was the original, says he, of the immortal hatred betwixt the two rival nations. 'Tis true, he colours the falsehood of Æneas by an 30 express command from Jupiter, to forsake the queen who had obliged him; but he knew the Romans were to be his readers; and them he bribed, perhaps at the expense of his hero's honesty; but he gained his cause, however, as pleading before corrupt judges. They 35 were content to see their founder false to love; for still he had the advantage of the amour; it was their enemy whom he forsook; and she might have forsaken him, if he had not got the start of her; she had already 5 forgotten her vows to her Sichæus; and varium et mutabile semper femina is the sharpest satire, in the fewest words, that ever was made on womankind; for both the adjectives are neuter, and animal must be understood, to make them grammar. Virgil does well

 10 to put those words into the mouth of Mercury. If a God had not spoken them, neither durst he have written them, nor I translated them. Yet the deity was forced to come twice on the same errand; and the second time, as much a hero as Æneas was, he frightened
 15 him. It seems he feared not Jupiter so much as Dido; for your Lordship may observe that, as much intent as he was upon his voyage, yet he still delayed it, till the messenger was obliged to tell him plainly, that, if he weighed not anchor in the night, the queen would be 20 with him in the morning. Notumque furens quid femina possit; she was injured; she was revengeful; she was powerful. The poet had likewise before hinted that her people were naturally perfidious; for he gives their character in their queen, and makes a proverb of Punica
 25 fides, many ages before it was invented.

Thus, I hope, my Lord, that I have made good my promise, and justified the poet, whatever becomes of the false knight. And sure a poet is as much privileged to lie as an ambassador, for the honour and interest 30 of his country; at least as Sir Henry Wotton has defined.

This naturally leads me to the defence of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries; for it is certain that the hero lived almost 35 two hundred years before the building of Carthage.

One who imitates Boccalini says that Virgil was accused before Apollo for this error. The God soon found that he was not able to defend his favourite by reason ; for the case was clear : he therefore gave this middle sentence, that anything might be allowed to his son Virgil, on the 5 account of his other merits ; that, being a monarch, he had a dispensing power, and pardoned him. But, that this special act of grace might never be drawn into example, or pleaded by his puny successors in justification of their ignorance, he decreed for the future, no 10 poet should presume to make a lady die for love two hundred years before her birth. To moralize this story, Virgil is the Apollo who has this dispensing power. His great judgment made the laws of poetry ; but he never made himself a slave to them ; chronology, 15 at best, is but a cobweb-law, and he broke through it with his weight. They who will imitate him wisely, must choose, as he did, an obscure and a remote era, where they may invent at pleasure, and not be easily contradicted. Neither he, nor the Romans, had ever 20 read the Bible, by which only his false computation of times can be made out against him. This Segrain says in his defence, and proves it from his learned friend Bochartus, whose letter on this subject he has printed at the end of the Fourth Æneid, to which I refer your 25 Lordship and the reader. Yet the credit of Virgil was so great, that he made this fable of his own invention pass for an authentic history, or at least as credible as anything in Homer. Ovid takes it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an ancient heroine of 30 Virgil's new-created Dido ; dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ungrateful fugitive ; and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a sword with a man so much superior in force to him, on the same subject. I think I may judge of this, because 35

- I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own ; he borrows all from a greater master in his own profession ; and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds. Nature fails 5 him ; and, being forced to his old shift, he has recourse to witticism. This passes indeed with his soft admirers, and gives him the preference to Virgil in their esteem. But let them like for themselves, and not prescribe to others : for our author needs not their admiration.
- 10 The motives that induced Virgil to coin this fable, I have shewed already ; and have also begun to show that he might make this anachronism, by superseding the mechanic rules of poetry, for the same reason that a monarch may dispense with or suspend his own 15 laws, when he finds it necessary so to do, especially if those laws are not altogether fundamental. Nothing is to be called a fault in poetry, says Aristotle, but what is against the art ; therefore a man may be an admirable poet without being an exact chronologer. Shall we 20 dare, continues Segrais, to condemn Virgil for having made a fiction against the order of time, when we commend Ovid and other poets, who have made many of their fictions against the order of Nature ? For what else
25 these are beautiful as they are related, and have also deep learning and instructive mythologies couched under them : but to give, as Virgil does in this episode, the original cause of the long wars betwixt Rome and Carthage, to draw truth out of fiction after so probable 30 a manner, with so much beauty, and so much for the honour of his country, was proper only to the divine wit of Maro ; and Tasso, in one of his Discourses, admires him for this particularly. 'Tis not lawful, indeed, to contradict a point of history which is known to all the contemporaries with Alexander ; but, in the dark recesses of antiquity, a great poet may and ought to feign such things as he finds not there, if they can be brought to embellish that subject which he treats. On the other side, the pains and diligence of ill poets is but thrown away, when they want the genius to invent and feign agreeably. But, if the fictions be delightful (which they always are, if they be natural), if they be of a piece ; if the beginning, the middle, and the end be in their due places, and artfully united to each other, such works can never fail of their deserved success. And such is Virgil's episode of Dido and Æneas ; where the sourest critic must acknowledge that if he had deprived his Æneis of so great an ornament, because he found no traces of it in antiquity, he had avoided their unjust 15 censure, but had wanted one of the greatest beauties of his poem. I shall say more of this in the next article of their charge against him, which is want of invention. In the meantime, I may affirm, in honour of this episode, that it is not only now esteemed the most pleasing 20 entertainment of the Æneis, but was so accounted in his own age, and before it was mellowed into that reputation which time has given it ; for which I need produce no other testimony than that of Ovid, his contemporary :
35 world, as, for example, to make Hannibal and Scipio

25

*Nec pars ulla magis legitur de corpore toto,
Quam non legitimo fœdere junctus amor.*

Where, by the way, you may observe, my Lord, that Ovid, in those words, Non legitimo fœdere junctus amor, will by no means allow it to be a lawful marriage 30 betwixt Dido and Æneas. He was in banishment when he wrote those verses, which I cite from his letter to Augustus : 'You, Sir,' says he, 'have sent me into exile for writing my Art of Love, and my wanton Elegies ; yet your own poet was happy in your good 35 graces, though he brought Dido and Æneas into a cave, and left them there not over honestly together. May I be so bold to ask your Majesty, is it a greater fault to teach the art of unlawful love, than to show it in the action ?' But was Ovid, the court-poet, so bad a courtier as to find no other plea to excuse himself than by a plain accusation of his master ? Virgil confessed it was a lawful marriage betwixt the lovers, that Juno, the Goddess of Matrimony, had ratified it by her presence ; for it was her business to bring matters to that issue. That the ceremonies were short, we may believe ; for Dido was not only amorous, but a widow. Mercury himself, though employed on a quite contrary errand, yet owns it a marriage by an innuendo: pulchramque uxori urbem Exstruis. He calls Æneas not only a husband, but upbraids him for being a fond husband, as the word uxorius implies. Now mark a little, if your Lordship pleases, why Virgil is so much concerned to make this marriage (for he seems to be the father of the bride himself, and to give her to the bridegroom): it was to make way for the divorce which he intended afterwards ; for he was a finer flatterer than Ovid ; and I more than conjecture that he had in his eye the divorce which not long before had passed betwixt the Emperor and Scribonia. He drew this dimple in the cheek of Æneas, to prove Augustus of the same family by so remarkable a feature in the same place. Thus, as we say in our homespun English proverb, he killed two birds with one stone ; pleased the Emperor, by giving him the resemblance of his ancestor, and gave him such a resemblance as was not scandalous in that age. For, to leave one wife, and take another, was but a matter of gallantry at that time of day among the Romans. Neque hæc in fœdera veni is the very excuse which Æneas makes, when he leaves his lady : 'I made no such bargain with you at our marriage, to live always drudging on at Carthage: my business was Italy; and I never made a secret of it. If I took my pleasure, had not you your share of it? I leave you free, at my departure, to comfort yourself with the next 5 stranger who happens to be shipwrecked on your coast. Be as kind a hostess as you have been to me; and you can never fail of another husband. In the meantime, I call the Gods to witness, that I leave you shore unwillingly; for, though Juno made the marriage, yet 10 Jupiter commands me to forsake you.' This is the effect of what he saith, when it is dishonoured out of Latin verse into English prose. If the poet argued not aright, we must pardon him for a poor blind heathen, who knew no better morals. 15

I have detained your Lordship longer than I intended on this objection; which would indeed weigh something in a spiritual court, but I am not to defend our poet there. The next, I think, is but a cavil, though the cry is great against him, and hath continued from the 20 time of Macrobius to this present age. I hinted it before. They lay no less than want of invention to his charge—a capital crime, I must acknowledge; for a poet is a maker, as the word signifies; and he who cannot make, that is, invent, has his name for nothing. 25 That which makes this accusation look so strange at the first sight, is, that he has borrowed so many things from Homer, Apollonius Rhodius, and others who preceded him. But, in the first place, if invention is to be taken in so strict a sense that the matter of a poem must be 30 wholly new, and that in all its parts, then Scaliger has made out, says Segrais, that the history of Troy was no more the invention of Homer than of Virgil. There was not an old woman, or almost a child, but had it in their mouths, before the Greek poet or his friends 35 digested it into this admirable order in which we read it. At this rate, as Solomon hath told us, there is nothing new beneath the sun. Who then can pass for an inventor, if Homer, as well as Virgil, must be 5 deprived of that glory? Is Versailles the less a new building, because the architect of that palace hath imitated others which were built before it? Walls, doors, and windows, apartments, offices, rooms of convenience and magnificence, are in all great houses. So descrip-

 10 tions, figures, fables, and the rest, must be in all heroic poems; they are the common materials of poetry, furnished from the magazine of nature; every poet hath as much right to them, as every man hath to air or water.

15 Quid prohibetis aquas? Usus communis aquarum est.

But the argument of the work, that is to say, its principal action, the œconomy and disposition of it; these are the things which distinguish copies from originals. The poet who borrows nothing from others is yet to be 20 born; he and the Jews' Messiah will come together. There are parts of the Æneis which resemble some parts both of the Ilias and of the Odysseis; as, for example, Æneas descended into Hell, and Ulysses had been there before him; Æneas loved Dido, and 25 Ulysses loved Calypso; in few words, Virgil hath imitated Homer's Odysseis in his first six books, and, in his six last, the Ilias. But from hence can we infer that the two poets write the same history? Is there no invention in some other parts of Virgil's Æneis? The 30 disposition of so many various matters, is not that his own? From what book of Homer had Virgil his episode of Nisus and Euryalus, of Mezentius and Lausus? From whence did he borrow his design of bringing Æneas into Italy? of establishing the Roman Empire
 35 on the foundations of a Trojan colony? to say nothing of the honour he did his patron, not only in his descent from Venus, but in making him so like her in his best features, that the Goddess might have mistaken Augustus for her son. He had indeed the story from common fame, as Homer had his from the Egyptian priestess. 5 Æneadum genetrix was no more unknown to Lucretius than to him. But Lucretius taught him not to form his hero, to give him piety or valour for his manners, and both in so eminent a degree, that, having done what was possible for man to save his king and country, his mother 10 was forced to appear to him, and restrain his fury, which hurried him to death in their revenge. But the poet made his piety more successful; he brought off his father and his son; and his Gods witnessed to his devotion, by putting themselves under his protection, to 15 be replaced by him in their promised Italy. Neither the invention nor the conduct of this great action were owing to Homer, or any other poet. 'Tis one thing to copy, and another thing to imitate from Nature. The copier is that servile imitator, to whom Horace gives 20 no better a name than that of animal; he will not so much as allow him to be a man. Raphael imitated Nature; they who copy one of Raphael's pieces imitate but him; for his work is their original. They translate him, as I do Virgil; and fall as short of him, as I of 25 Virgil. There is a kind of invention in the imitation of Raphael; for, though the thing was in Nature, yet the idea of it was his own. Ulysses travelled; so did Æneas: but neither of them were the first travellers; for Cain went into the land of Nod before they were 30 born: and neither of the poets ever heard of such a man. If Ulysses had been killed at Troy, yet Æneas must have gone to sea, or he could never have arrived in Italy. But the designs of the two poets were as different as the courses of their heroes; one went home, 35 and the other sought a home. To return to my first similitude: suppose Apelles and Raphael had each of them painted a burning Troy, might not the modern painter have succeeded as well as the ancient, though 5 neither of them had seen the town on fire? For the draughts of both were taken from the ideas which they had of Nature. Cities had been burnt before either of them were in being. But, to close the simile as I begun it; they would not have designed after the same manner.

10 Apelles would have distinguished Pyrrhus from the rest of all the Grecians, and shewed him forcing his entrance into Priam's palace; there he had set him in the fairest light, and given him the chief place of all his figures; because he was a Grecian, and he would do honour to 15 his country. Raphael, who was an Italian, and descended from the Trojans, would have made Æneas the hero of his piece; and perhaps not with his father on his back, his son in one hand, his bundle of gods in the other, and his wife following (for an act of piety is not half so 20 graceful in a picture as an act of courage): he would rather have drawn him killing Androgeos, or some other, hand to hand; and the blaze of the fires should have darted full upon his face, to make him conspicuous amongst his Trojans. This, I think, is a just comparison
25 betwixt the two poets, in the conduct of their several designs. Virgil cannot be said to copy Homer; the Grecian had only the advantage of writing first. If it be urged, that I have granted a resemblance in some parts, yet therein Virgil has excelled him. For what 30 are the tears of Calypso for being left, to the fury and death of Dido? Where is there the whole process of her passion and all its violent effects to be found, in the languishing episode of the Odysseis? If this be to copy, let the critics shew us the same disposition, 35 features, or colouring, in their original. The like may be said of the Descent to Hell, which was not of Homer's invention neither; he had it from the story of Orpheus and Eurydice. But to what end did Ulysses make that journey? Æneas undertook it by the express commandment of his father's ghost; there he was to show him all the succeeding heroes of his race, and, next to Romulus (mark, if you please, the address of Virgil), his own patron, Augustus Cæsar. Anchises was likewise to instruct him how to manage the Italian war, and how to conclude it with his honour; that is, in other words, to lay the foundations of that Empire which Augustus was to govern. This is the noble invention of our author; but it has been copied by so many sign-post daubers, that now 'tis grown fulsome, rather by their want of skill, than by the commonness.

In the last place, I may safely grant that, by reading Homer, Virgil was taught to imitate his invention; that is, to imitate like him; which is no more than if a painter studied Raphael, that he might learn to design after his manner. And thus I might imitate Virgil, if I were capable of writing an heroic poem, and yet the invention be my own: but I should endeavour to avoid a servile copying. I would not give the same story under other names, with the same characters, in the same order, and with the same sequel; for every common reader to find me out at the first sight for a plagiarist, and cry: 'This I read before in Virgil, in a better language, and in better verse: this is like Merry Andrew on the low rope, copying lubberly the same tricks which his master is so dexterously performing on the high.'

I will trouble your Lordship but with one objection more, which I know not whether I found in Le Fèvre, or Valois; but I am sure I have read it in another

French critic, whom I will not name, because I think it is not much for his reputation. Virgil, in the heat of action—suppose, for example, in describing the fury of his hero in a battle, when he is endeavouring to raise 5 our concernments to the highest pitch—turns short on the sudden into some similitude, which diverts, say they, your attention from the main subject, and mispends it on some trivial image. He pours cold water into the caldron, when his business is to make it boil.

10 This accusation is general against all who would be thought heroic poets; but I think it touches Virgil less than any. He is too great a master of his art, to make a blot which may so easily be hit. Similitudes, as I have said, are not for tragedy, which is all violent, and where 15 the passions are in a perpetual ferment; for there they deaden where they should animate; they are not of the nature of dialogue, unless in comedy: a metaphor is almost all the stage can suffer, which is a kind of similitude comprehended in a word. But this figure has 20 a contrary effect in heroic poetry; there it is employed to raise the admiration, which is its proper business; and admiration is not of so violent a nature as fear or hope, compassion or horror, or any concernment we can have for such or such a person on the stage. Not but 25 I confess that similitudes and descriptions, when drawn into an unreasonable length, must needs nauseate the reader. Once, I remember, and but once, Virgil makes a similitude of fourteen lines; and his description of Fame is about the same number. He is blamed for 30 both; and I doubt not but he would have contracted them, had he lived to have reviewed his work; but faults are no precedents. This I have observed of his similitudes in general, that they are not placed, as our unobserving critics tell us, in the heat of any action, 35 but commonly in its declining. When he has warmed us in his description as much as possibly he can, then, lest that warmth should languish, he renews it by some apt similitude, which illustrates his subject, and yet palls not his audience. I need give your Lordship but one example of this kind, and leave the rest to your observation, when next you review the whole Æneis in the original, unblemished by my rude translation. 'Tis in the First Book, where the poet describes Neptune composing the ocean, on which Æolus had raised a tempest without his permission. He had already chidden the 10 rebellious winds for obeying the commands of their usurping master; he had warned them from the seas; he had beaten down the billows with his mace, dispelled the clouds, restored the sunshine, while Triton and Cymothoë were heaving the ships from off the quick- 15 sands, before the poet would offer at a similitude for illustration:—

*Ac, veluti magno in populo cum saepe coorta est
Seditio, sævitque animis ignobile vulgus, Jamque faces et saxa volant; furor arma ministrat; 20
Tum, pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem
Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant;
Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet;
Sic cunctus pelagi cecidit fragor, æquora postquam
Prospiciens genitor, cæloque invectus aperto, 25
Fleciit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo.*

This is the first similitude which Virgil makes in this poem, and one of the longest in the whole; for which reason I the rather cite it. While the storm was in its fury, any allusion had been improper; for the poet 30 could have compared it to nothing more impetuous than itself; consequently he could have made no illustration. If he could have illustrated, it had been an ambitious ornament out of season, and would have diverted our concernment: nunc non erat hisce locus; 35 and therefore he deferred it to its proper place.

These are the criticisms of most moment which have been made against the Æneis by the Ancients or Moderns. As for the particular exceptions against this or that passage, Macrobius and Pontanus have answered them already. If I desired to appear more learned than I am, it had been as easy for me to have taken their objections and solutions, as it is for a country parson to take the expositions of the fathers out of Junius and Tremellius, or not to have named the authors from whence I had them; for so Ruæus, otherwise a most judicious commentator on Virgil's works, has used Pontanus, his greatest benefactor; of whom he is very silent; and I do not remember that he once cites him.

What follows next is no objection; for that implies a fault: and it had been none in Virgil, if he had extended the time of his action beyond a year. At least Aristotle has set no precise limits to it. Homer's, we know, was within two months: Tasso, I am sure, exceeds not a summer; and, if I examined him, perhaps he might be reduced into a much less compass. Bossu leaves it doubtful whether Virgil's action were within the year, or took up some months beyond it. Indeed, the whole dispute is of no more concernment to the common reader, than it is to a ploughman, whether February this year had 28 or 29 days in it. But, for the satisfaction of the more curious (of which number I am sure your Lordship is one), I will translate what I think convenient out of Segrais, whom perhaps you have not read; for he has made it highly probable that the action of the Æneis began in the spring, and was not extended beyond the autumn. And we have known campaigns that have begun sooner, and have ended later.

Ronsard, and the rest whom Segrais names, who are of opinion that the action of this poem takes up almost a year and half, ground their calculation thus. Anchises died in Sicily at the end of winter, or beginning of the spring. Æneas, immediately after the interment of his father, puts to sea for Italy. He is surprised by the 5 tempest described in the beginning of the First Book ; and there it is that the scene of the poem opens, and where the action must commence. He is driven by this storm on the coasts of Afric ; he stays at Carthage all that summer, and almost all the winter following, sets 10 sail again for Italy just before the beginning of the spring, meets with contrary winds, and makes Sicily the second time. This part of the action completes the year. Then he celebrates the anniversary of his father's funerals, and shortly after arrives at Cumæ ; and from 15 thence his time is taken up in his first treaty with Latinus, the overture of the war, the siege of his camp by Turnus, his going for succours to relieve it, his return, the raising of the siege by the first battle, the twelve days' truce, the second battle, the assault of 20 Laurentum, and the single fight with Turnus ; all which, they say, cannot take up less than four or five months more ; by which account we cannot suppose the entire action to be contained in a much less compass than a year and half.

25

Segraï reckons another way ; and his computation is not condemned by the learned Ruæus, who compiled and published the commentaries on our poet which we call the Dauphin's Virgil.

He allows the time of year when Anchises died to be 30 in the latter end of winter, or the beginning of the spring : he acknowledges that, when Æneas is first seen at sea afterwards, and is driven by the tempest on the coast of Afric, is the time when the action is naturally to begin : he confesses, further, that Æneas left Carthage 35 in the latter end of winter ; for Dido tells him in express terms, as an argument for his longer stay,

Quinetiam hiberno moliris sidere classem.

But, whereas Ronsard's followers suppose that, when 5 Æneas had buried his father, he set sail immediately for Italy (though the tempest drove him on the coast of Carthage), Segráis will by no means allow that supposition, but thinks it much more probable that he remained in Sicily till the midst of July, or the beginning of 10 August ; at which time he places the first appearance of his hero on the sea ; and there opens the action of the poem. From which beginning, to the death of Turnus, which concludes the action, there need not be supposed above ten months of intermediate time : for,
 15 arriving at Carthage in the latter end of summer, staying there the winter following, departing thence in the very beginning of the spring, making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judged the business but of ten¹
 20 months. To this the Ronsardians reply, that, having been for seven years before in quest of Italy, and having no more to do in Sicily than to inter his father—after that office was performed, what remained for him, but, without delay, to pursue his first adventure ? To 25 which Segráis answers, that the obsequies of his father, according to the rites of the Greeks and Romans, would detain him for many days ; that a longer time must be taken up in the refitting of his ships after so tedious a voyage, and in refreshing his 30 weather-beaten soldiers on a friendly coast. These indeed are but suppositions on both sides ; yet those of Segráis seem better grounded : for the feast of Dido, when she entertained Æneas first, has the appearance of a summer's night, which seems already almost ended when he begins his story; therefore the love was made in autumn: the hunting followed properly when the heats of that scorching country were declining; the winter was passed in jollity, as the season and their love required; and he left her in the latter end of winter, as is already proved. This opinion is fortified by the arrival of Æneas at the mouth of Tiber; which marks the season of the spring; that season being perfectly described by the singing of the birds saluting the dawn, and by the beauty of the place, which the poet seems to have painted expressly in the Seventh Æneid—

¹ 'three,' ed. 1697.

*Aurora in roseis fulgebat lutea bigis,
Cum venti posuere. . . .*

15

. . . Varix, circumque supraque, Assuetæ ripis volucres, et fluminis alveo, Æthera mulcebant cantu. . . .

The remainder of the action required but three months more: for, when Æneas went for succour to the Tuscans, he found their army in a readiness to march, and wanting only a commander: so that, according to this calculation, the Æneis takes not up above a year complete, and may be comprehended in less compass.

This, amongst other circumstances treated more at large by Segrais, agrees with the rising of Orion, which caused the tempest described in the beginning of the First Book. By some passages in the Pastorals, but more particularly in the Georgics, our poet is found to be an exact astronomer, according to the knowledge of that age. Now Ilioneus (whom Virgil twice employs in embassies, as the best speaker of the Trojans) attributes that tempest to Orion, in his speech to Dido—

Cum, subito assurgens fluctu, nimbosus Orion.—

35

He must mean either the heliacal or achronical rising of that sign. The heliacal rising of a constellation is when it comes from under the rays of the sun, and begins to appear before daylight; the achronical rising, 5 on the contrary, is when it appears at the close of day, and in opposition to the sun's diurnal course.

The heliacal rising of Orion is at present computed to be about the sixth of July; and about that time it is that he either causes or presages tempests on 10 the seas.

Segrais has observed further, that, when Anna counsels Dido to stay Æneas during the winter, she speaks also of Orion—

Dum pelago desævit hiems, et aquosus Orion.

15 If therefore Ilioneus, according to our supposition, understand the heliacal rising of Orion, Anna must mean the achronical, which the different epithets given to that constellation seem to manifest. Ilioneus calls him nimbosus; Anna, aquosus. He is tempestuous in 20 the summer, when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter, when he rises achronically. Your Lordship will pardon me for the frequent repetition of these cant words, which I could not avoid in this abbreviation of Segrais, who, I think, deserves no little commendation 25 in this new criticism.

I have yet a word or two to say of Virgil's machines, from my own observation of them. He has imitated those of Homer, but not copied them. It was established, long before this time, in the Roman religion 30 as well as in the Greek, that there were Gods; and both nations, for the most part, worshipped the same Deities; as did also the Trojans, from whom the Romans, I suppose, would rather be thought to derive the rites of their religion, than from the Grecians; 35 because they thought themselves descended from them.

Each of those Gods had his proper office, and the chief of them their particular attendants. Thus Jupiter had in propriety Ganymede and Mercury, and Juno had Iris. It was not then for Virgil to create new ministers: he must take what he found in his religion. It cannot therefore be said, that he borrowed them from Homer, any more than Apollo, Diana, and the rest, whom he uses as he finds occasion for them, as the Grecian poet did; but he invents the occasions for which he uses them. Venus, after the destruction of Troy, had gained Neptune entirely to her party; therefore we find him busy in the beginning of the Æneis, to calm the tempest raised by Æolus, and afterwards conducting the Trojan fleet to Cumæ in safety, with the loss only of their pilot, for whom he bargains. I name those two examples amongst a hundred which I omit; to prove that Virgil, generally speaking, employed his machines in performing those things which might possibly have been done without them. What more frequent than a storm at sea, upon the rising of Orion? What wonder, if, amongst so many ships, there should one be overset, which was commanded by Orontes, though half the winds had not been there which Æolus employed? Might not Palinurus, without a miracle, fall asleep, and drop into the sea, having been over-wearied with watching, and secure of a quiet passage, by his observation of the skies? At least Æneas, who knew nothing of the machine of Somnus, takes it plainly in this sense—

O nimum celo et pelago confise sereno, Nudus in ignota, Palinure, jacebis arena.

30

But machines sometimes are specious things to amuse the reader, and give a colour of probability to things otherwise incredible. And besides it soothed the vanity of the Romans, to find the Gods so visibly

- concerned in all the actions of their predecessors. We, who are better taught by our religion, yet own every wonderful accident, which befalls us for the best, to be brought to pass by some special providence of
- 5 Almighty God, and by the care of guardian Angels : and from hence I might infer, that no heroic poem can be writ on the Epicurean principles. Which I could easily demonstrate, if there were need to prove it, or I had leisure.
- 10 When Venus opens the eyes of her son Æneas, to behold the Gods who combated against Troy in that fatal night when it was surprised, we share the pleasure of that glorious vision (which Tasso has not ill copied in the sacking of Jerusalem) : but the Greeks
- 15 had done their business, though neither Neptune, Juno, nor Pallas had given them their divine assistance. The most crude machine which Virgil uses is in the episode of Camilla, where Opis, by the command of her mistress, kills Aruns. The next is in the Twelfth Æneid, where
- 20 Venus cures her son Æneas. But in the last of these the poet was driven to a necessity ; for Turnus was to be slain that very day ; and Æneas, wounded as he was, could not have engaged him in single combat, unless his hurt had been miraculously healed. And the poet
- 25 had considered that the dittany which she brought from Crete could not have wrought so speedy an effect without the juice of ambrosia which she mingled with it. After all, that his machine might not seem too violent, we see the hero limping after
- 30 Turnus. The wound was skinned ; but the strength of his thigh was not restored. But what reason had our author to wound Æneas at so critical a time ? and how came the cuisses to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour, which was all wrought by Vulcan
- 35 and his journey-men ? These difficulties are not easily to be solved without confessing that Virgil had not life enough to correct his work ; though he had reviewed it, and found those errors, which he resolved to mend : but, being prevented by death, and not willing to leave an imperfect work behind him, he ordained, by his last testament, that his Æneis should be burned. As for the death of Aruns, who was shot by a goddess, the machine was not altogether so outrageous as the wounding Mars and Venus by the sword of Diomedé. Two divinities, one would have thought, might have 10 pleaded their prerogative of impassibility, or at least not to have been wounded by any mortal hand ; beside that the ἰχθὺρ, which they shed, was so very like our common blood, that it was not to be distinguished from it, but only by the name and colour. As for 15 what Horace says in his Art of Poetry, that no machines are to be used, unless on some extraordinary occasion, that rule is to be applied to the theatre, of which he 20 is then speaking ; and means no more than this, that, when the knot of the play is to be untied, and no other way is left for making the discovery ; then, and not otherwise, let a God descend upon a rope, and clear the business to the audience : but this has no re- 25 lation to the machines which are used in an epic poem.

Nec deus intersit, nisi dignus vindice nodus—

In the last place, for the Dira, or flying pest, which, flapping on the shield of Turnus, and fluttering about his head, disheartened him in the duel, and presaged to him his approaching death, I might have placed 30 it more properly amongst the objections : for the critics, who lay want of courage to the charge of Virgil's hero, quote this passage as a main proof of their assertion. They say our author had not only secured him before the duel, but also, in the beginning of it, had given him the advantage in impenetrable arms, and in his sword; for that of Turnus was not his own, which was forged by Vulcan for his father, but a 5 weapon which he had snatched in haste, and by mistake, belonging to his charioteer Metiscus; that, after all this, Jupiter, who was partial to the Trojan, and distrustful of the event, though he had hung the balance, and given it a jog of his hand to weigh down 10 Turnus, thought convenient to give the Fates a collateral security, by sending the screech-owl to discourage him. For which they quote these words of Virgil,

... Non me tua turbida virtus
Terret, ait: di me terrent, et Jupiter hostis.

15 In answer to which, I say, that this machine is one of those which the poet uses only for ornament, and not out of necessity. Nothing can be more beautiful or more poetical than his description of the three Diræ, or the setting of the balance, which our Milton has 20 borrowed from him, but employed to a different end: for, first, he makes God Almighty set the scales for St. Michael and Satan, when he knew no combat was to follow; then he makes the good angel's scale descend, and the Devil's mount, quite contrary to 25 Virgil, if I have translated the three verses according to my author's sense—

Jupiter ipse duas æquato examine lances
Sustinet; et fata imponit diversa duorum;
Quem damnet labor, et quo vergat pondere letum—

30 for I have taken these words, quem damnet labor, in the sense which Virgil gives them in another place,—damnabis tu quoque votis,—to signify a prosperous event. Yet I dare not condemn so great a genius as Milton: for I am much mistaken if he alludes not to the text in Daniel, where Belshazzar was put into the balance and found too light. This is digression; and I return to my subject. I said above, that these two machines of the balance and the Dira were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without 5 them: for, when Æneas and Turnus stood fronting each other before the altar, Turnus looked dejected, and his colour faded in his face, as if he desponded of the victory before the fight; and not only he, but all his party, when the strength of the two champions was 10 judged by the proportion of their limbs, concluded it was impar pugna, and that their chief was over-matched: whereupon Juturna (who was of the same opinion) took this opportunity to break the treaty and renew the war. Juno herself had plainly told the nymph before-hand 15 that her brother was to fight

Imparibus fatis, nec dis nec viribus æquis;

so that there was no need of an apparition to fright Turnus: he had the presage within himself of his impending destiny. The Dira only served to confirm 20 him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat; and in this sense are those words of Virgil's to be taken,

... Non me tua turbida virtus

Terret, ait: di me terrent, et Jupiter hostis.

25

I doubt not but the adverb solum is to be understood; 'Tis not your valour only that gives me this concernment; but I find also, by this portent, that Jupiter is my enemy.' For Turnus fled before, when his first sword was broken, till his sister supplied him with a 30 better; which indeed he could not use, because Æneas kept him at a distance with his spear. I wonder Ruæus saw not this, where he charges his author so unjustly, for giving Turnus a second sword to no purpose. How could he fasten a blow, or make a thrust, when he was not suffered to approach? Besides, the chief errand of the Dira was to warn Juturna from the field; for she could have brought the chariot again, when she saw 5 her brother worsted in the duel. I might further add, that Æneas was so eager of the fight, that he left the city, now almost in his possession, to decide his quarrel with Turnus by the sword; whereas Turnus had manifestly declined the combat, and suffered his sister to 10 convey him as far from the reach of his enemy as she could. I say, not only suffered her, but consented to it; for 'tis plain he knew her, by these words:—

*O soror, et dudum agnovi, cum prima per artem Fœdera turbasti, teque hæc in bella dedisti;
 15 Et nunc nequicquam fallis dea. . . .*

I have dwelt so long on this subject, that I must contract what I have to say in reference to my translation, unless I would swell my Preface into a volume, and make it formidable to your Lordship, when you see so 20 many pages yet behind. And, indeed what I have already written, either in justification or praise of Virgil, is against myself, for presuming, to copy, in my coarse English, the thoughts and beautiful expressions of this inimitable poet, who flourished in an age when 25 his language was brought to its last perfection, for which it was particularly owing to him and Horace. I will give your Lordship my opinion, that those two friends had consulted each other's judgment, wherein they should endeavour to excel; and they seem to have 30 pitched on propriety of thought, elegance of words, and harmony of numbers. According to this model, Horace writ his Odes and Epodes: for his Satires and Epistles, being intended wholly for instruction, required another style:

and therefore, as he himself professes, are sermoni propiora, nearer prose than verse. But Virgil, who never attempted the lyric verse, is everywhere elegant, sweet, and flowing in his hexameters. His words are not only chosen, but the places in which he ranks them for the sound. He who removes them from the station wherein their master set them, spoils the harmony. What he says of the Sibyl's prophecies may be as properly applied to every word of his: they must be read in order as they lie; the least breath discomposes them; and somewhat of their divinity is lost. I cannot boast that I have been thus exact in my verses; but I have endeavoured to follow the example of my master, and am the first Englishman, perhaps, who made it his design to copy him in his numbers, his choice of words, and his placing them for the sweetness of the sound. On this last consideration I have shunned the cæsura as much as possibly I could: for, wherever that is used, it gives a roughness to the verse; of which we can have little need in a language which is overstocked with consonants. Such is not the Latin, where the vowels and consonants are mixed in proportion to each other: yet Virgil judged the vowels to have somewhat of an over-balance, and therefore tempers their sweetness with cæsuras. Such difference there is in tongues, that the same figure, which roughens one, gives majesty to another: and that was it which Virgil studied in his verses. Ovid uses it but rarely; and hence it is that his versification cannot so properly be called sweet, as luscious. The Italians are forced upon it once or twice in every line, because they have a redundancy of vowels in their language. Their metal is so soft, that it will not coin without alloy to harden it. On the other side, for the reason already named, 'tis all we can do to give sufficient sweetness to our language: we must not only choose our words for elegance, but for sound ; to perform which, a mastery in the language is required ; the poet must have a magazine of words, and have the art to manage his few vowels to the best advantage, that they may go the further. He must also know the nature of the vowels, which are more sonorous, and which more soft and sweet, and so dispose them as his present occasions require : all which, and a thousand secrets of versification beside, he may learn from Virgil, if he will take him for his guide. If he be above Virgil, and is resolved to follow his own verve, (as the French call it,) the proverb will fall heavily upon him : Who teaches himself, has a fool for his master.

Virgil employed eleven years upon his Æneis ; yet he left it, as he thought himself, imperfect ; which when I seriously consider, I wish that, instead of three years, which I have spent in the translation of his works, I had four years more allowed me to correct my errors, that I might make my version somewhat more tolerable than it is. For a poet cannot have too great a reverence for his readers, if he expects his labours should survive him. Yet I will neither plead my age nor sickness, in excuse of the faults which I have made : that I wanted time, is all that I have to say ; for some of my subscribers grew so clamorous, that I could no longer defer the publication. I hope, from the candour of your Lordship, and your often experienced goodness to me, that, if the faults are not too many, you will make allowances with Horace—

30 . . . si plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit natura.—

You may please also to observe, that there is not, to the best of my remembrance, one vowel gaping on another for want of a cæsura, in this whole poem : but, where a vowel ends a word, the next begins either with a consonant, or what is its equivalent; for our W and H aspirate, and our diphthongs, are plainly such. The greatest latitude I take is in the letter Y, when it concludes a word, and the first syllable of the next begins with a vowel. Neither need I have called this a latitude, which is only an explanation of this general rule, that no vowel can be cut off before another when we cannot sink the pronunciation of it; as he, she, me, I, etc. Virgil thinks it sometimes a beauty to imitate the licence of the Greeks, and leave two vowels opening on each other, as in that verse of the Third Pastoral,

Et succus pecori, et lac subducitur agnis.

But nobis non licet esse tam disertis, at least if we study to refine our numbers. I have long had by me the materials of an English Prosodia, containing all the mechanical rules of versification, wherein I have treated, with some exactness, of the feet, the quantities, and the pauses. The French and Italians know nothing of the two first; at least their best poets have not practised them. As for the pauses, Malherbe first brought them into France within this last century; and we see how they adorn their Alexandrines. But, as Virgil propounds a riddle, which he leaves unsolved—

Dic, quibus in terris, inscripti nomina regum Nascantur flores, et Phyllida solus habeto—

25 so I will give your Lordship another, and leave the exposition of it to your acute judgment. I am sure there are few who make verses, have observed the sweetness of these two lines in Cooper's Hill—

30

Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull;
Strong without rage; without o'erflowing, full.

And there are yet fewer who can find the reason of that sweetness. I have given it to some of my friends in conversation ; and they have allowed the criticism to be just. But, since the evil of false quantities is difficult to be cured in any modern language ; since the 5 French and the Italians, as well as we, are yet ignorant what feet are to be used in Heroic Poetry ; since I have not strictly observed those rules myself, which I can teach others ; since I pretend to no dictatorship among my fellow-poets ; since, if I should instruct some of 10 them to make well-running verses, they want genius to give them strength as well as sweetness ; and, above all, since your Lordship has advised me not to publish that little which I know, I look on your counsel as your command, which I shall observe inviolably, till

15 you shall please to revoke it, and leave me at liberty to make my thoughts public. In the meantime, that I may arrogate nothing to myself, I must acknowledge that Virgil in Latin, and Spenser in English, have been my masters. Spenser has also given me the boldness
20 to make use sometimes of his Alexandrine line, which we call, though improperly, the Pindaric, because Mr. Cowley has often employed it in his Odes. It adds a certain majesty to the verse, when it is used with judgment, and stops the sense from overflowing 25 into another line. Formerly the French, like us, and the Italians, had but five feet, or ten syllables, in their heroic verse ; but, since Ronsard's time as I suppose, they found their tongue too weak to support their epic poetry, without the addition of another foot. That 30 indeed has given it somewhat of the run and measure of a trimeter ; but it runs with more activity than strength : their language is not strung with sinews, like our English ; it has the nimbleness of a greyhound, but not the bulk and body of a mastiff. Our men and non numero, is the British motto. The French have set up purity for the standard of their language; and a masculine vigour is that of ours. Like their tongue is the genius of their poets, light and trifling in comparison of the English; more proper for sonnets, madrigals, and elegies, than heroic poetry. The turn on thoughts and words is their chief talent; but the Epic Poem is too stately to receive those little ornaments. The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits; but the weight of gold and of embroideries is reserved 10 for queens and goddesses. Virgil is never frequent in those turns, like Ovid, but much more sparing of them in his Æneis than in his Pastorals and Georgics.
35 our verses overbear them by their weight ; and Pondere,

Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere manes.

That turn is beautiful indeed; but he employs it in 15 the story of Orpheus and Eurydice, not in his great poem. I have used that licence in his Æneis sometimes; but I own it as my fault. 'Twas given to those who understand no better. 'Tis like Ovid's Semivirumque bovem, semibovemque virum.

20

The poet found it before his critics, but it was a darling sin, which he would not be persuaded to reform. The want of genius, of which I have accused the French, is laid to their charge by one of their own great authors, though I have forgotten his name, and 25 where I read it. If rewards could make good poets, their great master has not been wanting on his part in his bountiful encouragements: for he is wise enough to imitate Augustus, if he had a Maro. The triumvir and proscriber had descended to us in a more hideous 30 form than they now appear, if the Emperor had not taken care to make friends of him and Horace. I confess, the banishment of Ovid was a blot in his escutcheon: yet he was only banished; and who knows but his crime was capital, and then his exile was a favour? Ariosto, who, with all his faults, must be acknowledged a great poet, has put these words into 5 the mouth of an Evangelist: but whether they will pass for gospel now, I cannot tell.

*Non fu sì santo ni benigno Augusto,
 Come la tuba di Virgilio suona;
 L'haver havuto in poesia buon gusto,
 La proscrittione iniqua gli perdona.*

10

But Heroic Poetry is not of the growth of France, as it might be of England, if it were cultivated. Spenser wanted only to have read the rules of Bossu; for no man was ever born with a greater genius, or had more 15 knowledge to support it. But the performance of the French is not equal to their skill; and hitherto we have wanted skill to perform better. Segrais, whose preface is so wonderfully good, yet is wholly destitute of elevation, though his version is much better than that of 20 the two brothers, or any of the rest who have attempted Virgil. Hannibal Caro is a great name amongst the Italians; yet his translation of the Æneis is most scandalously mean, though he has taken the advantage of writing in blank verse, and freed himself from the 25 shackles of modern rhyme, if it be modern; for Le Clerc has told us lately, and I believe has made it out, that David's Psalms were written in as arrant rhyme as they are translated. Now, if a Muse cannot run when she is unfettered, it is a sign she has but little speed.
 30 I will not make a digression here, though I am strangely tempted to it; but will only say, that he who can write well in rhyme may write better in blank verse. Rhyme is certainly a constraint even to the best poets, and those who make it with most ease; though perhaps 35 I have as little reason to complain of that hardship as any man, excepting Quarles and Withers. What it adds to sweetness, it takes away from sense; and he who loses the least by it may be called a gainer. It often makes us swerve from an author's meaning; as, if a mark be set up for an archer at a great distance, 5 let him aim as exactly as he can, the least wind will take his arrow, and divert it from the white. I return to our Italian translator of the Æneis. He is a foot-poet, he lacqueys by the side of Virgil at the best, but never mounts behind him. Doctor Morelli, who is no 10 mean critic in our poetry, and therefore may be presumed to be a better in his own language, has confirmed me in this opinion by his judgment, and thinks, withal, that he has often mistaken his master's sense. I would say so, if I durst, but am afraid I have committed the 15 same fault more often, and more grossly; for I have forsaken Ruæus (whom generally I follow) in many places, and made expositions of my own in some, quite contrary to him; of which I will give but two examples, because they are so near each other in the Tenth 20 Æneid.

... Sorti Pater æquus utrique :

Pallas says it to Turnus, just before they fight. Ruæus thinks that the word Pater is to be referred to Evander, the father of Pallas. But how could he imagine that 25 it was the same thing to Evander, if his son were slain, or if he overcame? The poet certainly intended Jupiter, the common father of mankind; who, as Pallas hoped, would stand an impartial spectator of the combat, and not be more favourable to Turnus than to him. The 30 second is not long after it, and both before the duel is begun. They are the words of Jupiter, who comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, which was immediately to ensue, and which Hercules could not hinder (though the young hero had addressed his prayers to 35 him for his assistance) because the Gods cannot controul Destiny. The verse follows:—

Sic ait ; atque oculos Rutulorum rejicit arvis,— which the same Ruæus thus construes : Jupiter, after 5 he had said this, immediately turns his eyes to the Rutulian fields, and beholds the duel. I have given this place another exposition:—that he turned his eyes from the field of combat, that he might not behold a sight so unpleasing to him. The word rejicit, I know, 10 will admit of both senses ; but Jupiter, having confessed that he could not alter Fate, and being grieved he could not, in consideration of Hercules, it seems to me that he should avert his eyes, rather than take pleasure in the spectacle. But of this I am not so 15 confident as the other, though I think I have followed Virgil's sense.

What I have said, though it has the face of arrogance, yet is intended for the honour of my country ; and therefore I will boldly own, that this English translation 20 has more of Virgil's spirit in it than either the French or the Italian. Some of our countrymen have translated episodes and other parts of Virgil, with great success ;
 as particularly your Lordship, whose version of Orpheus and Eurydice is eminently good. Amongst the dead 25 authors, the Silenus of my Lord Roscommon cannot be too much commended. I say nothing of Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley ; 'tis the utmost of my ambition to be thought their equal, or not to be much inferior to them, and some others of the living.
 30 But 'tis one thing to take pains on a fragment, and translate it perfectly ; and another thing to have the weight of a whole author on my shoulders. They who believe the burthen light, let them attempt the Fourth, Sixth, or Eighth Pastoral ; the First or Fourth Georgic ; 35 and, amongst the Æneids, the Fourth, the Fifth, the Seventh, the Ninth, the Tenth, the Eleventh, or the Twelfth; for in these I think I have succeeded best.

Long before I undertook this work, I was no stranger to the original. I had also studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management 5 of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves somewhat to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but, above all, the elegance of his expressions, and the harmony of his numbers. For, as I have said in a former dis- 10 sertation, the words are, in Poetry, what the colours are in Painting; if the design be good, and the draught be true, the colouring is the first beauty that strikes the eye. Spenser and Milton are the nearest, in English, to Virgil and Horace in the Latin; and I have 15 endeavoured to form my style by imitating their masters. I will further own to you, my Lord, that my chief ambition is to please those readers who have discernment enough to prefer Virgil before any other poet in the Latin tongue. Such spirits as he desired to 20 please, such would I choose for my judges, and would stand or fall by them alone. Segráis has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes (he might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleased): in the lowest form 25 he places those whom he calls les petits esprits; such things as are our upper-gallery audience in a playhouse, who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit; prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense and elegant expression. These are mob readers: if Virgil 30 and Martial stood for Parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But, though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on't is, they are but a sort of French Huguenots, or Dutch boors, brought over in herds, but not naturalized; 35 who have not land of two pounds per annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their authors are of the same level, fit to represent them on a mountebank's stage, or to be masters of the ceremonies in a bear-garden. Yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that, as their readers improve their stock of sense (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment), they soon forsake them: and when the torrent from the mountains falls no more, the swelling writer is reduced into his shallow bed, like the Mançanares at Madrid with scarce water to moisten his own pebbles. There are a middle sort of readers (as we hold there is a middle state of souls), such as have a further insight than the former, yet have not the capacity of judging right; for I speak not of those who are bribed by a party, and know better, if they were not corrupted; but I mean a company of warm young men, who are not yet arrived so far as to discern the difference betwixt fustian, or ostentatious sentences, and the true sublime. These are above liking Martial, or Owen's Epigrams, but they would certainly set Virgil below Statius or Lucan. I need not say their poets are of the same taste with their admirers. They affect greatness in all they write; but 'tis a bladdered greatness, like that of the vain man whom Seneca describes; an ill habit of body, full of humours, and swelled with dropsy. Even these too desert their authors, as their judgment ripens. The young gentlemen themselves are commonly misled by their pedagogue at school, their tutor at the university, or their governor in their travels: and many of those three sorts are the most positive blockheads in the world. How many of those flatulent writers have I known, who have sunk in their reputation, after seven or eight editions of their works!

for indeed they are poets only for young men. They had great success at their first appearance; but, not being of God (as a wit said formerly), they could not stand.

I have already named two sorts of judges; but Virgil wrote for neither of them: and, by his example, I am not ambitious of pleasing the lowest or the middle form of readers.

He chose to please the most judicious: souls of the highest rank, and truest understanding. These are few in number; but whoever is so happy as to gain their approbation can never lose it, because they never give it blindly. Then they have a certain magnetism in their judgment, which attracts others to their sense. Every day they gain some new proselyte, and in time become the Church. For this reason, a well-weighted judicious poem, which at its first appearance gains no more upon the world than to be just received, and rather not blamed than much applauded, insinuates itself by insensible degrees into the liking of the reader: the more he studies it, the more it grows upon him; every time he takes it up, he discovers some new graces in it. And whereas poems which are produced by the vigour of imagination only have a gloss upon them at the first which time wears off, the works of judgment are like the diamond; the more they are polished, the more lustre they receive. Such is the difference betwixt Virgil's Æneis and Marini's Adone. And, if I may be allowed to change the metaphor, I would say, that Virgil is like the Fame which he describes—

Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo.

Such a sort of reputation is my aim, though in a far inferior degree, according to my motto in the title-page: Sequiturque patrem non passibus æquis: and therefore I appeal to the highest court of judicature, like that of the peers, of which your Lordship is so great an ornament.

Without this ambition, which I own, of desiring to please the judices natos, I could never have been able to 5 have done anything at this age, when the fire of poetry is commonly extinguished in other men. Yet Virgil has given me the example of Entellus for my encouragement: when he was well heated, the younger champion could not stand before him. And we find the elder 10 contended not for the gift, but for the honour: nec dona moror. For Dampier has informed us, in his Voyages, that the air of the country which produces gold is never wholesome.

I had long since considered that the way to please 15 the best judges is not to translate a poet literally, and Virgil least of any other: for, his peculiar beauty lying in his choice of words, I am excluded from it by the narrow compass of our heroic verse, unless I would make use of monosyllables only, and those clogged with 20 consonants, which are the dead weight of our mother-tongue. 'Tis possible, I confess, though it rarely happens, that a verse of monosyllables may sound harmoniously; and some examples of it I have seen. My first line of the Æneis is not harsh—

25 Arms, and the Man I sing, who forc'd by Fate, &c.

But a much better instance may be given from the last line of Manilius, made English by our learned and judicious Mr. Creech—

Nor could the World have borne so fierce a Flame—

30 where the many liquid consonants are placed so artfully, that they give a pleasing sound to the words, though they are all of one syllable.

'Tis true, I have been sometimes forced upon it in other places of this work: but I never did it out of choice ; I was either in haste, or Virgil gave me no occasion for the ornament of words ; for it seldom happens but a monosyllable line turns verse to prose ; and even that prose is rugged and unharmonious. Philarchus, I remember, taxes Balzac for placing 5 twenty monosyllables in file, without one dissyllable betwixt them. The way I have taken is not so strait as metaphrase, nor so loose as paraphrase : some things too I have omitted, and sometimes have added of my own. Yet the omissions, I hope, are but of circumstances, and such as would have no grace in English ; and the additions, I also hope, are easily deduced from Virgil's sense. They will seem (at least I have the vanity to think so), not stuck into him, but growing out of him. He studies brevity more than any other poet : 15 but he had the advantage of a language wherein much may be comprehended in a little space. We, and all the modern tongues, have more articles and pronouns, besides signs of tenses and cases, and other barbarities on which our speech is built by the faults of our forefathers. The Romans founded theirs upon the Greek : and the Greeks, we know, were labouring many hundred years upon their language, before they brought it to perfection. They rejected all those signs, and cut off as many articles as they could spare ; comprehend- 25 ing in one word what we are constrained to express in two ; which is one reason why we cannot write so concisely as they have done. The word pater, for example, signifies not only a father, but your father, my father, his or her father, all included in a word. 30

This inconvenience is common to all modern tongues ; and this alone constrains us to employ more words than the ancients needed. But having before observed that Virgil endeavours to be short, and at the same time elegant, I pursue the excellence and forsake the 35

brevity: for there he is like ambergris, a rich perfume, but of so close and glutinous a body, that it must be opened with inferior scents of musk or civet, or the sweetness will not be drawn out into another language.

5 On the whole matter, I thought fit to steer betwixt the two extremes of paraphrase and literal translation; to keep as near my author as I could, without losing all his graces, the most eminent of which are in the beauty of his words; and those words, I must add, are always 10 figurative. Such of these as would retain their elegance in our tongue, I have endeavoured to graft on it; but most of them are of necessity to be lost, because they will not shine in any but their own. Virgil has sometimes two of them in a line; but the scantiness of 15 our heroic verse is not capable of receiving more than one; and that too must expiate for many others which have none. Such is the difference of the languages, or such my want of skill in choosing words. Yet I may presume to say, and I hope with as much reason as 20 the French translator, that, taking all the materials of this divine author, I have endeavoured to make Virgil speak such English as he would himself have spoken, if he had been born in England, and in this present age. I acknowledge, with Segrais, that I have not 25 succeeded in this attempt according to my desire: yet I shall not be wholly without praise, if in some sort I may be allowed to have copied the clearness, the purity, the easiness, and the magnificence of his style. But I shall have occasion to speak further on this subject before I end the Preface.

When I mentioned the Pindaric line, I should have added, that I take another licence in my verses: for I frequently make use of triplet rhymes, and for the same reason, because they bound the sense. And 35 therefore I generally join these two licences together, and make the last verse of the triplet a Pindaric: for, besides the majesty which it gives, it confines the sense within the barriers of three lines, which would languish if it were lengthened into four. Spenser is my example for both these privileges of English verses; and Chapman has followed him in his translation of Homer. Mr. Cowley has given into them after both; and all succeeding writers after him. I regard them now as the Magna Charta of heroic poetry, and am too much an Englishman to lose what my ancestors have gained 10 for me. Let the French and Italians value themselves on their regularity; strength and elevation are our standard. I said before, and I repeat it, that the affected purity of the French has unsinewed their heroic verse. The language of an epic poem is almost wholly 15 figurative: yet they are so fearful of a metaphor, that no example of Virgil can encourage them to be bold with safety. Sure they might warm themselves by that sprightly blaze, without approaching it so close as to singe their wings; they may come as near it as their 20 master. Not that I would discourage that purity of diction in which he excels all other poets. But he knows how far to extend his franchises, and advances to the verge, without venturing a foot beyond it. On the other side, without being injurious to the memory 25 of our English Pindar, I will presume to say, that his metaphors are sometimes too violent, and his language is not always pure. But at the same time I must excuse him; for through the iniquity of the times he was forced to travel, at an age when, instead of learning 30 foreign languages, he should have studied the beauties of his mother-tongue, which, like all other speeches, is to be cultivated early, or we shall never write it with any kind of elegance. Thus, by gaining abroad, he lost at home; like the painter in the Arcadia, who, going to 35

see a skirmish, had his arms lopped off, and returned, says Sir Philip Sidney, well instructed how to draw a battle, but without a hand to perform his work.

There is another thing in which I have presumed to 5 deviate from him and Spenser. They both make hemistichs (or half verses), breaking off in the middle of a line. I confess there are not many such in the Fairy Queen; and even those few might be occasioned by his unhappy choice of so long a stanza. Mr. Cowley had found out
 10 that no kind of staff is proper for a heroic poem, as being all too lyrical: yet, though he wrote in couplets, where rhyme is freer from constraint, he frequently affects half verses; of which we find not one in Homer, and I think not in any of the Greek poets, or the Latin,
 15 excepting only Virgil; and there is no question but he thought he had Virgil's authority for that licence. But, I am confident, our poet never meant to leave him, or any other, such a precedent: and I ground my opinion on these two reasons: first, we find no example of 20 a hemistich in any of his Pastorals or Georgics; for he had given the last finishing strokes to both these poems: but his Æneis he left so incorrect, at least so short of that perfection at which he aimed, that we know how hard a sentence he passed upon it: and, in the 25 second place, I reasonably presume, that he intended to have filled up all those hemistichs, because in one of them we find the sense imperfect—

Quem tibi jam Troja . . .

which some foolish grammarian has ended for him with 30 a half line of nonsense—

. . . peperit fumante Creusa :

for Ascanius must have been born some years before the burning of that city; which I need not prove. On the other side, we find also, that he himself filled up one line in the Sixth Æneid, the enthusiasm seizing him while he was reading to Augustus—

*Misenum Æolidem, quo non præstantior alter
Ære ciere viros . . .*

to which he added, in that transport, Martemque accendere cantu : and never was any line more nobly finished ; for the reasons which I have given in the Book of Painting. On these considerations I have shunned hemistichs ; not being willing to imitate Virgil to a fault, like Alexander's courtiers, who affected to hold their necks awry, because he could not help it. I am confident your Lordship is by this time of my opinion, and that you will look on those half lines hereafter as the imperfect products of a hasty Muse ; like the frogs and serpents in the Nile ; part of them kindled into life, and part a lump of unformed unanimated mud.

I am sensible that many of my whole verses are as imperfect as those halves, for want of time to digest them better : but give me leave to make the excuse of Boccace, who, when he was upbraided that some of his novels had not the spirit of the rest, returned this answer, that Charlemain, who made the Paladins, was never able to raise an army of them. The leaders may be heroes, but the multitude must consist of common men.

I am also bound to tell your Lordship, in my own defence, that, from the beginning of the First Georgic to the end of the last Æneid, I found the difficulty of translation growing on me in every succeeding book. For Virgil, above all poets, had a stock, which I may call almost inexhaustible, of figurative, elegant, and sounding words : I, who inherit but a small portion of his genius, and write in a language so much inferior to the Latin, have found it very painful to vary phrases, when the same sense returns upon me. Even he himself, whether out of necessity or choice, has often expressed the same thing in the same words, and often repeated two or three whole verses which he had used before. Words are not so easily coined as money; and yet we see that the credit not only of banks but of exchequers cracks, when little comes in, and much goes out. Virgil called upon me in every line for some new word: and I paid so long, that I was almost bankrupt; so that the latter end must needs be more burdensome than the beginning or the middle; and, consequently, the Twelfth Æneid cost me double the time of the First and Second. What had become of me, if Virgil had taxed me with another book? I had certainly been reduced to pay the public in hammered money, for want of milled; that is, in the same old words which I had used before: and the receivers must have been forced to have taken any thing, where there was so little to be had.

Besides this difficulty (with which I have struggled, and made a shift to pass it over), there is one remaining, which is insuperable to all translators. We are bound to our author's sense, though with the latitudes already mentioned; for I think it not so sacred, as that one iota must not be added or diminished, on pain of an Anathema. But slaves we are, and labour on another man's plantation; we dress the vineyard, but the wine is the owner's: if the soil be sometimes barren, then we are sure of being scourged: if it be fruitful, and our care succeeds, we are not thanked; for the proud reader will only say, the poor drudge has done his duty. But this is nothing to what follows; for, being obliged to make his sense intelligible, we are forced to untune our own verses, that we may give his meaning to the reader. He, who invents, is master of his thoughts and words: he can turn and vary them as he pleases, till he renders them harmonious ; but the wretched translator has no such privilege : for, being tied to the thoughts, he must make what music he can in the expression ; and, for this reason, it cannot always be so sweet as that of the original. There is a beauty of sound, as Segrais has observed, in some Latin words, which is wholly lost in any modern language. He instances in that mollis amaracus, on which Venus lays Cupid, in the First Æneid. If I should translate it sweet marjoram, as the word signifies, the reader would think I had mistaken 10 Virgil : for those village words, as I may call them, give us a mean idea of the thing ; but the sound of the Latin is so much more pleasing, by the just mixture of the vowels with the consonants, that it raises our fancies to conceive somewhat more noble than a common herb, and 15 to spread roses under him, and strew lilies over him ; a bed not unworthy the grandson of the goddess.

If I cannot copy his harmonious numbers, how shall I imitate his noble flights, where his thoughts and words are equally sublime ? Quem 20

... quisquis studet æmulari,
 ... cærat is ope Dædalea
Nititur pennis, vitreo daturus Nomina ponto.

What modern language, or what poet, can express 25 the majestic beauty of this one verse, amongst a thousand others ?

Aude, hospes, contemnere opes, et te quoque dignum Finge deo. . .

For my part, I am lost in the admiration of it : I condemn the world when I think on it, and myself when I translate it. 30

Lay by Virgil, I beseech your Lordship, and all my better sort of judges, when you take up my version ; and it will appear a passable beauty when the original 35

Muse is absent. But, like Spenser's false Florimel made of snow, it melts and vanishes when the true one comes in sight. I will not excuse, but justify myself, for one pretended crime, with which I am liable to be 5 charged by false critics, not only in this translation, but in many of my original poems ; that I latinize too much. 'Tis true, that, when I find an English word significant and sounding, I neither borrow from the Latin, nor any other language ; but, when I want at home, I must seek 10 abroad.

*Sounding words, imported from fr.
countries enrich the language*

If sounding words are not of our growth and manufacture, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation, which is never to return ; but what I bring from 15 Italy, I spend in England : here it remains, and here it circulates ; for, if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead, for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity ; but,
 20 if we will have things of magnificence and splendour, we must get them by commerce. Poetry requires ornament ; and that is not to be had from our old Teuton monosyllables : therefore, if I find any elegant word in a classic author, I propose it to be naturalized,
 25 by using it myself ; and, if the public approves of it, the bill passes. But every man cannot distinguish between pedantry and poetry : every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate. Upon the whole matter, a poet must first be certain that the word he would introduce is beautiful in 30 the Latin, and is to consider, in the next place, whether it will agree with the English idiom : after this, he ought to take the opinion of judicious friends, such as are learned in both languages : and, lastly, since no man is infallible, let him use this licence very sparingly
 35 for if too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed not to assist the natives, but to conquer them.

I am now drawing towards a conclusion, and suspect your Lordship is very glad of it. But permit me first to own what helps I have had in this undertaking. The late Earl of Lauderdale sent me over his new translation of the Æneis, which he had ended before I engaged in the same design. Neither did I then intend it : but, some proposals being afterwards made me by my bookseller, I desired his Lordship's leave that I might accept them, which he freely granted ; and I have his letter yet to show for that permission. He resolved to have printed his work ; which he might have done two years before I could publish mine ; and had performed it if death had not prevented him. But, having his manuscript in my hands, I consulted it as often as I doubted of my author's sense ; for no man understood Virgil better than that learned Nobleman. His friends, I hear, have yet another and more correct copy of that translation by them, which, had they pleased to have given the public, the judges must have been convinced that I have not flattered him. Besides this help, which was not inconsiderable, Mr. Congreve has done me the favour to review the Æneis, and compare my version with the original. I shall never be ashamed to own, that this excellent young man has shewed me many faults, which I have endeavoured to correct. 'Tis true, he might have easily found more, and then my translation had been more perfect.

Two other worthy friends of mine, who desire to have their names concealed, seeing me straitened in my time, took pity on me, and gave me the Life of Virgil, the two Prefaces to the Pastorals and the Georgics, and all the arguments in prose to the whole translation ; which, perhaps, has caused a report, that the two first poems are not mine. If it had been true, that I had taken their verses for my own, I might have gloried in their aid, and, like Terence, have fathered¹ the opinion that Scipio and Lælius joined with me. But the same style being continued through the whole, and the same laws of versification observed, are proofs sufficient, that this is one man's work : and your Lordship is too well acquainted with my manner, to doubt that any part of it is another's.

Why .10 That your Lordship may see I was in earnest when Technical terms I promised to hasten to an end, I will not give the right to be reasons why I writ not always in the proper terms of avoided navigation, land-service, or in the cant of any profession. I will only say, that Virgil has avoided those 15 proprieties, because he writ not to mariners, soldiers, astronomers, gardeners, peasants, etc., but to all in general, and in particular to men and ladies of the first quality, who have been better bred than to be too nicely knowing in the terms. In such cases, it is enough for 20 a poet to write so plainly, that he may be understood by his readers ; to avoid impropriety, and not affect to be thought learned in all things.

I have omitted the four preliminary lines of the First Æneid, because I think them inferior to any four others 25 in the whole poem, and consequently believe they are not Virgil's. There is too great a gap betwixt the adjective vicina in the second line, and the substantive arva in the latter end of the third, which keeps his meaning in obscurity too long, and is contrary to the 30 clearness of his style.

Ut quamvis avido

is too ambitious an ornament to be his ; and Gratum opus agricolis,

¹ farther'd, ed. 1697.

are all words unnecessary, and independent of what he had said before.

... Horrentia Martis

Arma ...

is worse than any of the rest. Horrentia is such a flat epithet, as Tully would have given us in his verses. It is a mere filler, to stop a vacancy in the hexameter, and connect the preface to the work of Virgil. Our author seems to sound a charge, and begins like the clangour of a trumpet—scarce a word without an r, and the vowels, for the greater part, sonorous. The prefacer began with Ille ego, which he was constrained to patch up in the fourth line with at nunc, to make the sense cohere; and, if both those words are not notorious botches, I am much deceived, though the French translator thinks otherwise. For my own part, I am rather of the opinion that they were added by Tucca and Varius, than re-trenched.

10

Arma, virumque cano, Trojæ qui primus ab oris

20

I know it may be answered, by such as think Virgil the author of the four lines, that he asserts his title to the Æneis in the beginning of his work, as he did to the two former in the last lines of the Fourth Georgic. I will not reply otherwise to this, than by desiring them to compare these four lines with the four others, which we know are his, because no poet but he alone could write them. If they cannot distinguish creeping from flying, let them lay down Virgil, and take up Ovid de Ponto, in his stead. My master needed not the assistance of that preliminary poet to prove his claim. His own majestic mien discovers him to be the king, amidst a thousand courtiers. It was a superfluous office; and, therefore, I would not set those verses in the front of Virgil, but have rejected them to my own preface.

I, who before, with Shepherds in the Groves,
Sung to my oaten Pipe, their rural Loves,
5 And, issuing thence, compell'd the neighbouring Field
A plenteous Crop of rising Corn to yield, Manur'd the Glebe, and stock'd the fruitful Plain,
(A Poem grateful to the greedy Swain), &c.

If there be not a tolerable line in all these six, the 10 prefacer gave me no occasion to write better. This is a just apology in this place; but I have done great wrong to Virgil in the whole translation: want of time, the inferiority of our language, the inconvenience of rhyme, and all the other excuses I have made, may 15 alleviate my fault, but cannot justify the boldness of my undertaking. What avails it me to acknowledge freely, that I have not been able to do him right in any line?
For even my own confession makes against me; and it will always be returned upon me, 'Why then did you 20 attempt it?' To which no other answer can be made, than that I have done him less injury than any of his former libellers.

What they called his picture, had been drawn at length, so many times, by the daubers of almost all 25 nations, and still so unlike him, that I snatched up the pencil with disdain; being satisfied beforehand, that I could make some small resemblance of him, though
I must be content with a worse likeness. A Sixth Pastoral, a Pharmaceutria, a single Orpheus, and some 30 other features, have been exactly taken: but those holiday authors writ for pleasure; and only shewed us what they could have done, if they would have taken pains to perform the whole.

Be pleased, my Lord, to accept, with your wonted
35 goodness, this unworthy present which I make you.

I have taken off one trouble from you, of defending it, by acknowledging its imperfections : and, though some part of them are covered in the verse, (as Erichthonius rode always in a chariot, to hide his lameness,) such of them as cannot be concealed, you will please to connive at, though, in the strictness of your judgment, you cannot pardon. If Homer was allowed to nod sometimes in so long a work, it will be no wonder if I often fall asleep. You took my Aureng-zebe into your protection, with all his faults : and I hope here cannot be so many, because I translate an author who gives me such examples of correctness. What my jury may be, I know not ; but it is good for a criminal to plead before a favourable judge : if I had said partial, would your Lordship have forgiven me ? or will you give me leave to acquaint the world, that I have many times been obliged to your bounty since the Revolution ? Though I never was reduced to beg a charity, nor ever had the impudence to ask one, either of your Lordship, or your noble kinsman the Earl of Dorset, much less of any other ; yet, when I least expected it, you have both remembered me : so inherent it is in your family not to forget an old servant. It looks rather like ingratitude on my part, that, where I have been so often obliged, I have appeared so seldom to return my thanks, and where I was also so sure of being well received. Somewhat of laziness was in the case, and somewhat too of modesty, but nothing of disrespect or of unthankfulness. I will not say that your Lordship has encouraged me to this presumption, lest, if my labours meet with no success in public, I may expose your judgment to be censured. As for my own enemies, I shall never think them worth an answer ; and, if your Lordship has any, they will not dare to arraign you for want of knowledge in this art, till they can produce somewhat better of their own, than your Essay on Poetry.

 'Twas on this consideration, that I have drawn out my Preface to so great a length. Had I not addressed to a poet and a critic of the first magnitude, I had 5 myself been taxed for want of judgment, and shamed my patron for want of understanding. But neither will you, my Lord, so soon be tired as any other, because the discourse is on your art; neither will the learned reader think it tedious, because it is ad Clerum. At least, 10 when he begins to be weary, the church doors are open.
 That I may pursue the allegory, with a short prayer,
 after a long sermon :

May you live happily and long, for the service of your Country, the encouragement of good Letters, and 15 the ornament of Poetry; which cannot be wished more earnestly by any man, than by

Your Lordship's most humble,

Most obliged, and most obedient Servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

POSTSCRIPT TO THE READER

20 WHAT Virgil wrote in the vigour of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years; struggling with wants, oppressed with sickness, curbed in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judges, if they are not very 25 equitable, already prejudiced against me, by the lying character which has been given them of my morals.
 Yet steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties, and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the public when I undertook this work. In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty Power the assistance He has given me in the beginning, the prosecution, and conclusion of my present studies, which are more happily performed than I could have promised to myself, when I laboured under such discouragements. For, what I have done, imperfect as it is for want of health and leisure to correct it, will be judged in after-ages, and possibly in the present, to be no dishonour to my native country, whose language and poetry would be more esteemed abroad, if they were better understood. Somewhat (give me leave to say) I have added to both of them in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers, which were wanting, especially the last, in all our poets, even in those who, being endued with genius, yet have not cultivated their mother-tongue with sufficient care; or, relying on the beauty of their thoughts, have judged the ornament of words, and sweetness of sound, unnecessary. One is for raking in Chaucer (our English Ennius) for antiquated words, which are never to be revived, but when sound or significancy is wanting in the present language. But many of his deserve not this redemption, any more than the crowds of men who daily die, or are slain for sixpence in a battle, merit to be restored to life, if a wish could revive them. Others have no ear for verse, nor choice of words, nor distinction of thoughts; but mingle farthings with their gold, to make up the sum. Here is a field of satire opened to me: but, since the Revolution, I have wholly renounced that talent. For who would give physic to the great, when he is uncalled?—to do his patient no good, and endanger himself for his prescription? Neither am I ignorant, but I may justly be condemned for many of those faults of which I have too liberally arraigned others.

... Cynthia aurem

Vellit, et admonuit...

5 'Tis enough for me, if the Government will let me pass unquestioned. In the meantime, I am obliged, in gratitude, to return my thanks to many of them, who have not only distinguished me from others of the same party, by a particular exception of grace, but, without 10 considering the man, have been bountiful to the poet: have encouraged Virgil to speak such English as I could teach him, and rewarded his interpreter for the pains he has taken in bringing him over into Britain, by defraying the charges of his voyage. Even Cer-
15 berus, when he had received the sop, permitted Æneas to pass freely to Elysium. Had it been offered me, and I had refused it, yet still some gratitude is due to such who were willing to oblige me; but how much more to those from whom I have received the favours which 20 they have offered to one of a different persuasion! Amongst whom I cannot omit naming the Earls of Derby and of Peterborough. To the first of these I have not the honour to be known; and therefore his liberality was as much unexpected as it was undeserved.
25 The present Earl of Peterborough has been pleased long since to accept the tenders of my service: his favours are so frequent to me, that I receive them almost by prescription. No difference of interests or opinion has been able to withdraw his protection from 30 me; and I might justly be condemned for the most unthankful of mankind, if I did not always preserve for him a most profound respect and inviolable gratitude. I must also add, that, if the last Æneid shine amongst its fellows, 'tis owing to the commands of Sir William 35 Trumball, one of the principal Secretaries of State, who recommended it, as his favourite, to my care; and for his sake particularly, I have made it mine. For who would confess weariness, when he enjoined a fresh labour? I could not but invoke the assistance of a Muse, for this last office.

5

Extremum hunc, Arethusa . . .

. . . Negat quis carmina Gallo?

Neither am I to forget the noble present which was made me by Gilbert Dolben, Esq., the worthy son of the late Archbishop of York, who, when I began this work, enriched me with all the several editions of Virgil, and all the commentaries of those editions in Latin; amongst which, I could not but prefer the Dauphin's¹, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrini I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.

Being invited by that worthy gentleman, Sir William Bowyer, to Denham Court, I translated the First Georgic at his house, and the greatest part of the last Æneid. A more friendly entertainment no man ever found. No wonder, therefore, if both those versions surpass the rest, and own the satisfaction I received in his converse, with whom I had the honour to be bred in Cambridge, and in the same college. The Seventh Æneid was made English at Burleigh, the magnificent abode of the Earl of Exeter. In a village belonging to his family I was born; and under his roof I endeavoured to make that Æneid appear in English with as much lustre as I could; though my author has not given the finishing strokes either to it, or to the Eleventh, as I perhaps could prove in both, if I durst presume to criticise my master.

¹ The Dolphins, ed. 1697.

By a letter from William Walsh, of Abberley, Esq. (who has so long honoured me with his friendship, and who, without flattery, is the best critic of our nation), I have been informed, that his Grace the Duke of 5 Shrewsbury has procured a printed copy of the Pastorals, Georgics, and first six Æneids, from my bookseller, and has read them in the country, together with my friend. This noble person having been pleased to give them a commendation, which I presume not to insert, 10 has made me vain enough to boast of so great a favour, and to think I have succeeded beyond my hopes; the character of his excellent judgment, the acuteness of his wit, and his general knowledge of good letters, being known as well to all the world, as the sweetness of his 15 disposition, his humanity, his easiness of access, and desire of obliging those who stand in need of his protection, are known to all who have approached him, and to me in particular, who have formerly had the honour of his conversation. Whoever has given the world the 20 translation of part of the Third Georgic, which he calls The Power of Love, has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his; as my Lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr. Addison of Oxford has also 25 been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account. After his Bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving. Mr. Cowley's Praise of a Country Life is excellent, but is rather an imitation of Virgil than a version. That I have recovered, in some 30 measure, the health which I had lost by too much application to this work, is owing, next to God's mercy, to the skill and care of Dr. Guibbons and Dr. Hobbs, the two ornaments of their profession, whom I can only pay by this acknowledgment. The whole Faculty has 35 always been ready to oblige me; and the only one of them, who endeavoured to defame me, had it not in his power. I desire pardon from my readers for saying so much in relation to myself, which concerns not them; and, with my acknowledgments to all my subscribers, have only to add, that the few Notes which follow are 5 par manière d'acquit, because I had obliged myself by articles to do somewhat of that kind. These scattering observations are rather guesses at my author's meaning in some passages, than proofs that so he meant. The unlearned may have recourse to any poetical dictionary 10 in English, for the names of persons, places, or fables, which the learned need not: but that little which I say is either new or necessary; and the first of these qualifications never fails to invite a reader, if not to please him.

PREFACE

TO THE FABLES

[1700]

'Tis with a Poet, as with a man who designs to build, and is very exact, as he supposes, in casting up the cost beforehand ; but, generally speaking, he is mistaken in his account, and reckons short of the expense
5 he first intended. He alters his mind as the work proceeds, and will have this or that convenience more, of which he had not thought when he began. So has it happened to me ; I have built a house, where I intended but a lodge ; yet with better success than 10 a certain nobleman, who, beginning with a dog-kennel, never lived to finish the palace he had contrived.

From translating the First of Homer's Iliads, (which I intended as an essay to the whole work,) I proceeded to the translation of the Twelfth Book of Ovid's Meta-
15 morphoses, because it contains, among other things, the causes, the beginning, and ending, of the Trojan war. Here I ought in reason to have stopped ; but the speeches of Ajax and Ulysses lying next in my way, I could not balk 'em. When I had compassed them, 20 I was so taken with the former part of the Fifteenth Book, (which is the masterpiece of the whole Metamorphoses,) that I enjoined myself the pleasing task of rendering it into English. And now I found, by the number of my verses, that they began to swell into a little volume ; which gave me an occasion of looking backward on some beauties of my author, in his former books : there occurred to me the Hunting of the Boar, Cinyras and Myrrha, the good-natured story of Baucis and Philemon, with the rest, which I hope I have translated closely enough, and given them the same turn of verse which they had in the original ; and this, I may say, without vanity, is not the talent of every poet. He who has arrived the nearest to it, is the ingenious and learned Sandys, the best versifier of the former age ; if I may properly call it by that name, which was the former part of this concluding century. For Spenser and Fairfax both flourished in the reign of Queen Elizabeth ; great masters in our language, and who saw much further into the beauties of our numbers than those who immediately followed them. Milton was the poetical son of Spenser, and Mr. Waller of Fairfax ; for we have our lineal descents and clans as well as other families. Spenser more than once insinuates, that the soul of Chaucer was transfused into his body ; and that he was begotten by him two hundred years after his decease. Milton has acknowledged to me, that Spenser was his original ; and many besides myself have heard our famous Waller own, that he derived the harmony of his numbers from Godfrey of Bulloign, which was turned into English by Mr. Fairfax.

But to return : having done with Ovid for this time, it came into my mind, that our old English poet, Chaucer, in many things resembled him, and that with no disadvantage on the side of the modern author, as I shall endeavour to prove when I compare them ; and as I am, and always have been, studious to promote the honour of my native country, so I soon resolv'd to put their merits to the trial, by turning some of the Canterbury Tales into our language, as it is now refined; for by this means, both the poets being set in the same light, and dressed in the same English habit, story to be compared with story, a certain judgment may be made betwixt them by the reader, without obtruding my opinion on him. Or, if I seem partial to my countryman and predecessor in the laurel, the friends of antiquity are not few; and, besides many of the learned, Ovid has almost all the Beaux, and the whole Fair Sex, his declared patrons. Perhaps I have assumed somewhat more to myself than they allow me, because I have adventured to sum up the evidence; but the readers are the jury, and their privilege remains entire, to decide according to the merits of the cause; or, if they please, to bring it to another hearing before some other court. In the mean time, to follow the thread of my discourse (as thoughts, according to Mr. Hobbes, have always some connexion,) so from Chaucer I was led to think on Boccace, who was not only his contemporary, but also pursued the same studies; wrote novels in prose, and many works in verse; particularly is said to have invented the octave rhyme, or stanza of eight lines, which ever since has been maintained by the practice of all Italian writers who are, or at least assume the title of heroic poets. He and Chaucer, among other things, had this in common, that they refined their mother-tongues; but with this difference, that Dante had begun to file their language, at least in verse, before the time of Boccace, who likewise received no little help from his master Petrarch; but the reformation of their prose was wholly owing to Boccace himself, who is yet the standard of purity in the Italian tongue, though many of his phrases are become obsolete, as in process of time it must needs happen. Chaucer (as you have formerly been told by our learned Mr. Rymer) first adorned and amplified our barren tongue from the Provençal¹, which was then the most polished of all the modern languages; but this subject has been copiously treated; by that great critic, who deserves no little commendation from us his countrymen. For these reasons of time, and resemblance of genius, in Chaucer and Boccace, I resolved to join them in my present work; to which I have added some original papers of my own, 10 which whether they are equal or inferior to my other poems, an author is the most improper judge; and therefore I leave them wholly to the mercy of the reader. I will hope the best, that they will not be condemned; but if they should, I have the excuse of 15 an old gentleman, who, mounting on horseback before some ladies, when I was present, got up somewhat heavily, but desired of the fair spectators, that they would count fourscore and eight before they judged him. By the mercy of God, I am already come within 20 twenty years of his number; a cripple in my limbs, but what decays are in my mind, the reader must determine. I think myself as vigorous as ever in the faculties of my soul, excepting only my memory, which is not impaired to any great degree; and if I lose not 25 more of it, I have no great reason to complain. What judgment I had, increases rather than diminishes; and thoughts, such as they are, come crowding in so fast upon me, that my only difficulty is to choose or to reject, to run them into verse, or to give them the 30 other harmony of prose: I have so long studied and practised both, that they are grown into a habit, and become familiar to me. In short, though I may lawfully plead some part of the old gentleman's excuse,

¹ Provençal, ed. 1700.

yet I will reserve it till I think I have greater need, and ask no grains of allowance for the faults of this my present work, but those which are given of course to human frailty. I will not trouble my reader with 5 the shortness of time in which I writ it, or the several intervals of sickness. They who think too well of their own performances, are apt to boast in their prefaces how little time their works have cost them, and what
10 other business of more importance interfered ; but the reader will be as apt to ask the question, why they allowed not a longer time to make their works more perfect ? and why they had so despicable an opinion of their judges as to thrust their indigested stuff upon them, as if they deserved no better ?

15 With this account of my present undertaking, I conclude the first part of this discourse : in the second part, as at a second sitting, though I alter not the draught, I must touch the same features over again, and change the dead-colouring of the whole. In general I will only 20 say, that I have written nothing which savours of immorality or profaneness ; at least, I am not conscious to myself of any such intention. If there happen to be found an irreverent expression, or a thought too wanton, they are crept into my verses through my inadvertency :
25 if the searchers find any in the cargo, let them be staved or forfeited, like counterbanded goods ; at least, let their authors be answerable for them, as being but imported merchandise, and not of my own manufacture. On the other side, I have endeavoured to choose such 30 fables, both ancient and modern, as contain in each of them some instructive moral ; which I could prove by induction, but the way is tedious, and they leap foremost into sight, without the reader's trouble of looking after them. I wish I could affirm, with a safe conscience, 35 that I had taken the same care in all my former writings ; for it must be owned, that supposing verses are never so beautiful or pleasing, yet, if they contain anything which shocks religion or good manners, they are at best what Horace says of good numbers without good sense, Versus inopes rerum, nugæque canoræ. Thus 5 far, I hope, I am right in court, without renouncing to my other right of self-defence, where I have been wrongfully accused, and my sense wire-drawn into blasphemy or bawdry, as it has often been by a religious lawyer, in a late pleading against the stage ; in which 10 he mixes truth with falsehood, and has not forgotten the old rule of calumniating strongly, that something may remain.

I resume the thrird of my discourse with the first of my translations, which was the first Iliad of Homer. If 15 it shall please God to give me longer life, and moderate health, my intentions are to translate the whole Ilias ; provided still that I meet with those encouragements from the public, which may enable me to proceed in my undertaking with some cheerfulness. And this I dare 20 assure the world beforehand, that I have found, by trial, Homer a more pleasing task than Virgil, though I say not the translation will be less laborious ; for the Grecian is more according to my genius than the Latin poet. In the works of the two authors we may read their 25 manners, and natural inclinations, which are wholly different. Virgil was of a quiet, sedate temper ; Homer was violent, impetuous, and full of fire. The chief talent of Virgil was propriety of thoughts, and ornament of words : Homer was rapid in his thoughts, and took 30 all the liberties, both of numbers and of expressions, which his language, and the age in which he lived, allowed him. Homer's invention was more copious, Virgil's more confined ; so that if Homer had not led the way, it was not in Virgil to have begun heroic 35 poetry ; for nothing can be more evident, than that the Roman poem is but the second part of the Ilias ; a continuation of the same story, and the persons already formed. The manners of Æneas are those of Hector, 5 superadded to those which Homer gave him. The adventures of Ulysses in the Odysseis are imitated in the first Six Books of Virgil's Æneis ; and though the accidents are not the same, (which would have argued him of a servile copying, and total barrenness of in- 10 vention,) yet the seas were the same in which both the heroes wandered ; and Didô cannot be denied to be the poetical daughter of Calypso. The six latter Books of Virgil's poem are the four-and-twenty Iliads contracted ; a quarrel occasioned by a lady, a single 15 combat, battles fought, and a town besieged. I say not this in derogation to Virgil, neither do I contradict anything which I have formerly said in his just praise ; for his episodes are almost wholly of his own invention, and the form which he has given to the telling makes 20 the tale his own, even though the original story had been the same. But this proves, however, that Homer taught Virgil to design ; and if invention be the first virtue of an epic poet, then the Latin poem can only be allowed the second place. Mr. Hobbes, in the preface 25 to his own bald translation of the Ilias, (studying poetry as he did mathematics, when it was too late,) Mr. Hobbes, I say, begins the praise of Homer where he should have ended it. He tells us, that the first beauty of an epic poem consists in diction ; that is, in 30 the choice of words, and harmony of numbers. Now the words are the colouring of the work, which, in the order of nature, is last to be considered. The design, the disposition, the manners, and the thoughts, are all before it : where any of those are wanting or imperfect, 35 so much wants or is imperfect in the imitation of human life, which is in the very definition of a poem. Words, indeed, like glaring colours, are the first beauties that arise and strike the sight ; but, if the draught be false or lame, the figures ill disposed, the manners obscure or inconsistent, or the thoughts unnatural, then the finest colours are but daubing, and the piece is a beautiful monster at the best. Neither Virgil nor Homer were deficient in any of the former beauties ; but in this last, which is expression, the Roman poet is at least, equal to the Grecian, as I have said elsewhere : supplying the poverty of his language by his musical ear, and by his diligence.

But to return : our two great poets being so different in their tempers, one choleric and sanguine, the other phlegmatic and melancholic ; that which makes them excel in their several ways is, that each of them has followed his own natural inclination, as well in forming the design, as in the execution of it. The very heroes shew their authors : Achilles is hot, impatient, revengeful—

Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer, &c.,

Æneas patient, considerate, careful of his people, and merciful to his enemies ; ever submissive to the will of heaven—

... quo fata trahunt retrahuntque, sequamur.

I could please myself with enlarging on this subject, but am forced to defer it to a fitter time. From all I have said, I will only draw this inference, that the action of Homer, being more full of vigour than that of Virgil, according to the temper of the writer, is of consequence more pleasing to the reader. One warms you by degrees ; the other sets you on fire all at once, and never intermits his heat. 'Tis the same difference which Longinus makes betwixt the effects of eloquence in Demosthenes and Tully; one persuades, the other commands. You never cool while you read Homer, even not in the Second Book (a graceful flattery to his countrymen); but he hastens from the ships, and concludes not that book till he has made you an amends by the violent playing of a new machine. From thence he hurries on his action with variety of events, and ends it in less compass than two months. This vehemence of his, I confess, is more suitable to my temper; and, therefore, I have translated his First Book with greater pleasure than any part of Virgil; but it was not a pleasure without pains. The continual agitations of the spirits must needs be a weakening of any constitution, especially in age; and many pauses are required for refreshment betwixt the heats; the Iliad of itself being a third part longer than all Virgil's works together.

This is what I thought needful in this place to say of Homer. I proceed to Ovid and Chaucer; considering the former only in relation to the latter. With Ovid ended the golden age of the Roman tongue; from Chaucer the purity of the English tongue began. The manners of the poets were not unlike. Both of them were well-bred, well-natured, amorous, and libertine, at least in their writings; it may be, also in their lives. Their studies were the same, philosophy and philology. Both of them were knowing in astronomy; of which Ovid's books of the Roman Feasts, and Chaucer's Treatise of the Astrolabe, are sufficient witnesses. But Chaucer was likewise an astrologer, as were Virgil, Horace, Persius, and Manilius. Both writ with wonderful facility and clearness; neither were great inventors: for Ovid only copied the Grecian fables, and most of Chaucer's stories were taken from his Italian contemporaries, or their predecessors. Boccace his Decameron was first published, and from thence our Englishman has borrowed many of his Canterbury Tales: yet that of Palamon and Arcite was written, in all probability, by some Italian wit, in a former age, as I shall prove hereafter. The tale of Grizild was the invention of Petrarch; by him sent to Boccace, from whom it came to Chaucer. Troilus and Cressida was also written by a Lombard author, but much amplified by our English translator, as well as beautified; the genius of our countrymen, in general, being rather to improve an invention than to invent themselves, as is evident not only in our poetry, but in many of our manufactures. I find I have anticipated already, and taken up from Boccace before I come to him: but there is so much less behind; and I am of the temper of most kings, who love to be in debt, are all for present money, no matter how they pay it afterwards: besides, the nature of a preface is rambling, never wholly out of the way, nor in it. This I have learned from the practice of honest Montaigne, and return at my pleasure to Ovid and Chaucer, of whom I have little more to say.

Both of them built on the inventions of other men; yet since Chaucer had something of his own, as The Wife of Bath's Tale, The Cock and the Fox, which I have translated, and some others, I may justly give our countryman the precedence in that part; since I can remember nothing of Ovid which was wholly his. Both of them understood the manners; under which name I comprehend the passions, and, in a larger sense, the descriptions of persons, and their very habits. For an example, I see Baucis and Philemon as perfectly before me, as if some ancient painter had drawn them; and all the Pilgrims in the Canterbury Tales, their humours, their features, and the very dress, as distinctly as if I had supped with them at the Tabard in Southwark.

Yet even there, too, the figures of Chaucer are much more lively, and set in a better light; which though I have not time to prove, yet I appeal to the reader, and am sure he will clear me from partiality. The 5 thoughts and words remain to be considered, in the comparison of the two poets, and I have saved myself one-half of the labour, by owning that Ovid lived when the Roman tongue was in its meridian; Chaucer, in the dawning of our language: therefore that part of the 10 comparison stands not on an equal foot, any more than the diction of Ennius and Ovid, or of Chaucer and our present English. The words are given up, as a post not to be defended in our poet, because he wanted the modern art of fortifying. The thoughts remain to be 15 considered; and they are to be measured only by their propriety; that is, as they flow more or less naturally from the persons described, on such and such occasions. The vulgar judges, which are nine parts in ten of all nations, who call conceits and jingles wit, who see Ovid
20 full of them, and Chaucer altogether without them, will think me little less than mad for preferring the Englishman to the Roman. Yet, with their leave, I must presume to say, that the things they admire are only glittering trifles, and so far from being witty, that in 25 a serious poem they are nauseous, because they are unnatural. Would any man, who is ready to die for love, describe his passion like Narcissus? Would he think of inopem me copia fecit, and a dozen more of such expressions, poured on the neck of one another, and 30 signifying all the same thing? If this were wit, was this a time to be witty, when the poor wretch was in the agony of death? This is just John Littlewit, in Bartholomew Fair, who had a conceit (as he tells you) left him in his misery; a miserable conceit. On these occasions 35 the poet should endeavour to raise pity; but, instead of this, Ovid is tickling you to laugh. Virgil never made use of such machines when he was moving you to commiserate the death of Dido: he would not destroy what he was building. Chaucer makes Arcite violent in his love, and unjust in the pursuit of it; yet, when he came to die, he made him think more reasonably: he repents not of his love, for that had altered his character; but acknowledges the injustice of his proceedings, and resigns Emilia to Palamon. What would Ovid have done on this occasion? He would certainly have made Arcite witty on his deathbed; he had complained he was further off from possession, by being so near, and a thousand such boyisms, which Chaucer rejected as below the dignity of the subject. They who think otherwise, would, by the same reason, prefer Lucan and Ovid to Homer and Virgil, and Martial to all four of them. As for the turn of words, in which Ovid particularly excels all poets, they are sometimes a fault, and sometimes a beauty, as they are used properly or improperly; but in strong passions always to be shunned, because passions are serious, and will admit no playing. The French have a high value for them; and, I confess, they are often what they call delicate, when they are introduced with judgment; but Chaucer writ with more simplicity, and followed Nature more closely than to use them. I have thus far, to the best of my knowledge, been an upright judge betwixt the parties in competition, not meddling with the design nor the disposition of it; because the design was not their own; and in the disposing of it they were equal. It remains that I say somewhat of Chaucer in particular.

In the first place, as he is the father of English poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer, or the Romans Virgil. He is a perpetual fountain of good sense; learn'd in all sciences; and, therefore, speaks properly on all subjects. As he knew what to say, so he knows also when to leave off; a continence which is practised by few writers, and scarcely by any of the ancients, excepting Virgil and Horace. One of our late great poets is sunk in his reputation, because he could never forgive any conceit which came in his way; but swept like a drag-net, great and small. There was plenty enough, but the dishes were ill sorted; whole pyramids of sweet-meats for boys and women, but little of solid meat for men. All this proceeded not from any want of knowledge, but of judgment. Neither did he want that in discerning the beauties and faults of other poets, but only indulged himself in the luxury of writing; and perhaps knew it was a fault, but hoped the reader would not find it. For this reason, though he must always be thought a great poet, he is no longer esteemed a good writer; and for ten impressions, which his works have had in so many successive years, yet at present a hundred books are scarcely purchased once a twelve-month; for, as my last Lord Rochester said, though somewhat profanely, Not being of God, he could not stand.

Chaucer followed Nature everywhere, but was never so bold to go beyond her; and there is a great difference of being poeta and nimis poeta, if we may believe Catullus, as much as betwixt a modest behaviour and affectation. The verse of Chaucer, I confess, is not harmonious to us; but 'tis like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus commends, it was auribus istius temporis accommodata: they who lived with him, and some time after him, thought it musical; and it continues so, even in our judgment, if compared with the numbers of Lidgate and Gower, his contemporaries: there is the rude sweetness of a Scotch tune in it, which is natural and pleasing, though not perfect. 'Tis true, I cannot go so far as he who published the last edition of him ; for he would make us believe the fault is in our ears, and that there were really ten syllables in a verse where we find but nine : but this opinion is not worth confuting ; 'tis so gross and obvious an error, that common sense (which is a rule in everything but matters of Faith and Revelation) must convince the reader, that equality of numbers, in every verse which we call heroic, was either not known, or not always practised, in Chaucer's age. It were an easy matter to produce some thousands of his verses, which are lame for want of half a foot, and sometimes a whole one, and which no pronunciation can make otherwise. We can only say, that he lived in the infancy of our poetry, and that nothing is brought to perfection at the first. We must be children before we grow men. There was an Ennius, and in process of time a Lucilius, and a Lucretius, before Virgil and Horace ; even after Chaucer there was a Spenser, a Harrington, a Fairfax, before Waller and Denham were in being ; and our numbers were in their nonage till these last appeared. I need say little of his parentage, life, and fortunes ; they are to be found at large in all the editions of his works. He was employed abroad, and favoured, by Edward the Third, Richard the Second, and Henry the Fourth, and was poet, as I suppose, to all three of them. In Richard's time, I doubt, he was a little dipt in the rebellion of the Commons ; and being brother-in-law to John of Ghant, it was no wonder if he followed the fortunes of that family ; and was well with Henry the Fourth when he had deposed his predecessor. Neither is it to be admired, that Henry, who was a wise as well as a valiant prince, who claimed by succession, and was sensible that his title was not sound, but was rightfully in Mortimer, who had married the heir of York; it was not to be admired, I say, if that great politician should be pleased to have the greatest Wit of those times in his interests, and to be the trumpet of his praises. 5 Augustus had given him the example, by the advice of Mæcenas, who recommended Virgil and Horace to him; whose praises helped to make him popular while he was alive, and after his death have made him precious to posterity. As for the religion of our poet, he 10 seems to have some little bias towards the opinions of Wicliffe, after John of Ghant his patron; somewhat of which appears in the tale of Piers Plowman: yet I cannot blame him for inveighing so sharply against the vices of the clergy in his age: their pride, their 15 ambition, their pomp, their avarice, their worldly interest, deserved the lashes which he gave them, both in that, and in most of his Canterbury Tales. Neither has his contemporary Boccace spared them: yet both those poets lived in much esteem with good and holy 20 men in orders; for the scandal which is given by particular priests reflects not on the sacred function. Chaucer's Monk, his Canon, and his Friar, took not from the character of his Good Parson. A satirical poet is the check of the laymen on bad priests. We are only 25 to take care, that we involve not the innocent with the guilty in the same condemnation. The good cannot be too much honoured, nor the bad too coarsely used; for the corruption of the best becomes the worst. When a clergyman is whipped, his gown is first taken off, by 30 which the dignity of his order is secured. If he be wrongfully accused, he has his action of slander; and 'tis at the poet's peril if he transgress the law. But they will tell us, that all kind of satire, though never so well deserved by particular priests, yet brings the whole 35 order into contempt. Is then the peerage of England anything dishonoured when a peer suffers for his treason? If he be libelled, or any way defamed, he has his scandalum magnatum to punish the offender. They who use this kind of argument, seem to be conscious to themselves of somewhat which has deserved the poet's lash, and are less concerned for their public capacity than for their private; at least there is pride at the bottom of their reasoning. If the faults of men in orders are only to be judged among themselves, they are all in some sort parties; for, since they say the honour of their order is concerned in every member of it, how can we be sure that they will be impartial judges? How far I may be allowed to speak my opinion in this case, I know not; but I am sure a dispute of this nature caused mischief in abundance betwixt a King of England and an Archbishop of Canterbury; one standing up for the laws of his land, and the other for the honour (as he called it) of God's Church; which ended in the murder of the prelate, and in the whipping of his Majesty from post to pillar for his penance. The learned and ingenious Dr. Drake has saved me the labour of inquiring into the esteem and reverence which the priests have had of old; and I would rather extend than diminish any part of it: yet I must needs say, that when a priest provokes me without any occasion given him, I have no reason, unless it be the charity of a Christian, to forgive him: prior læsit is justification sufficient in the civil law. If I answer him in his own language, self-defence, I am sure must be allowed me; and if I carry it further, even to a sharp recrimination, somewhat may be indulged to human frailty. Yet my resentment has not wrought so far, but that I have followed Chaucer, in his character of a holy man, and have enlarged on that subject with some pleasure; reserving to myself the right, if I shall think fit hereafter, to describe another sort of priests, such as are more easily to be found than the Good Parson; such as have given the last blow to Christianity in this age, by a practice so contrary to their doctrine. But this will keep cold till another time. In the meanwhile, I take up Chaucer where I left him.

He must have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because, as it has been truly observed of him, he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury Tales the various manners and humours (as we now call them) of the whole English nation, in his age. Not a single character has escaped him. All his pilgrims are severally distinguished from each other; and not only in their inclinations, but in their very physiognomies and persons. Baptista Porta could not have described their natures better, than by the marks which the poet gives them. The matter and manner of their tales, and of their telling, are so suited to their different educations, humours, and callings, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and serious characters are distinguished by their several sorts of gravity: their discourses are such as belong to their age, their calling, and their breeding; such as are becoming of them, and of them only. Some of his persons are vicious, and some virtuous; some are unlearn'd, or (as Chaucer calls them) lewd, and some are learn'd. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different: the Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook, are several men, and distinguished from each other as much as the mincing Lady-Prioress and the broad-speaking, gap-toothed Wife of Bath. But enough of this; there is such a variety of game springing up before me, that I am distracted in my choice, and know not which to follow. 'Tis sufficient to say, according to the proverb, that here is God's plenty. We have our forefathers and great-grand-dames all before us, as they were in Chaucer's days: their general characters are still remaining in mankind, and even in England, though they are called by other names than those of Monks, and Friars, and Canons, and Lady Abbesses, and Nuns; 5 for mankind is ever the same, and nothing lost out of Nature, though everything is altered. May I have leave to do myself the justice, (since my enemies will do me none, and are so far from granting me to be a good poet, that they will not allow me so much as to 10 be a Christian, or a moral man), may I have leave, I say, to inform my reader, that I have confined my choice to such tales of Chaucer as savour nothing of immodesty. If I had desired more to please than to instruct, the Reeve, the Miller, the Shipman, the Merchant, the Summoner, 15 and, above all, the Wife of Bath, in the Prologue to her Tale, would have procured me as many friends and readers, as there are beaux and ladies of pleasure in the town. But I will no more offend against good manners: I am sensible as I ought to be of the scandal 20 I have given by my loose writings; and make what reparation I am able, by this public acknowledgment. If anything of this nature, or of profaneness, be crept into these poems, I am so far from defending it, that I disown it. Totum hoc indictum volo. Chaucer makes 25 another manner of apology for his broad speaking, and Boccace makes the like; but I will follow neither of them. Our countryman, in the end of his Characters, before the Canterbury Tales, thus excuses the ribaldry, which is very gross in many of his novels— 30

*But firste, I pray you, of your courtesye,
That ye ne arrete it not my villany,
Though that I plainly speak in this mattere,
To tellen you her words, and eke her chere:
Ne though I speak her words properly,
For this ye knowen as well as I,*

Who shall tellen a tale after a man,
 He mote rehearse as nye as ever he can :
 Everich word of it ben in his charge,
 All speke he, never so rudely, ne large :
 5 Or else he mote tellen his tale untrue,
 Or feine things, or find words new :
 He may not spare, altho he were his brother,
 He mote as wel say o word as another.
 Crist spake himself ful broad in holy Writ,
 10 And well I wote no villany is it,
 Eke Plato saith, who so can him rede,
 The words mote been cousin to the dede.

Yet if a man should have enquired of Boccace or of Chaucer, what need they had of introducing such char-15 acters, where obscene words were proper in their mouths, but very indecent to be heard ; I know not what answer they could have made ; for that reason, such tales shall be left untold by me. You have here a specimen of Chaucer's language, which is so obsolete, that his sense 20 is scarce to be understood ; and you have likewise more than one example of his unequal numbers, which were mentioned before. Yet many of his verses consist of ten syllables, and the words not much behind our present English : as for example, these two lines, in the 25 description of the Carpenter's young wife—

Wincing she was, as is a jolly colt,
 Long as a mast, and upright as a bolt.

I have almost done with Chaucer, when I have answered some objections relating to my present work.
 30 I find some people are offended that I have turned these tales into modern English ; because they think them unworthy of my pains, and look on Chaucer as a dry, old-fashioned wit, not worth reviving¹. I have often heard the late Earl of Leicester say, that Mr. Cowley 35 himself was of that opinion ; who, having read him over

¹ receiving, ed. 1700.

at my Lord's request, declared he had no taste of him. I dare not advance my opinion against the judgment of so great an author; but I think it fair, however, to leave the decision to the public. Mr. Cowley was too modest to set up for a dictator; and being shocked perhaps 5 with his old style, never examined into the depth of his good sense. Chaucer, I confess, is a rough diamond, and must first be polished, ere he shines. I deny not likewise, that, living in our early days of poetry, he writes not always of a piece; but sometimes mingles 10 trivial things with those of greater moment. Sometimes also, though not often, he runs riot, like Ovid, and knows not when he has said enough. But there are more great wits besides Chaucer, whose fault is their excess of conceits, and those ill sorted. An author is not to 15 write all he can, but only all he ought. Having observed this redundancy in Chaucer, (as it is an easy matter for a man of ordinary parts to find a fault in one of greater,) I have not tied myself to a literal translation; but have often omitted what I judged unnecessary, or not of dig- 20 nity enough to appear in the company of better thoughts. I have presumed further, in some places, and added somewhat of my own where I thought my author was deficient, and had not given his thoughts their true lustre, for want of words in the beginning of our lan- 25 guage. And to this I was the more emboldened, because (if I may be permitted to say it of myself) I found I had a soul congenial to his, and that I had been conversant in the same studies. Another poet, in another age, may take the same liberty with my writings; if at least they 30 live long enough to deserve correction. It was also necessary sometimes to restore the sense of Chaucer, which was lost or mangled in the errors of the press. Let this example suffice at present: in the story of Palamon and Arcite, where the temple of Diana is 35 described, you find these verses, in all the editions of our author :—

*There saw I Danè turned unto a tree,
I mean not the goddess Diane,
But Venus daughter, which that hight Danè.*

Which, after a little consideration, I knew was to be reformed into this sense, that Daphne, the daughter of Peneus, was turned into a tree. I durst not make thus bold with Ovid, lest some future Milbourne should arise, and say, I varied from my author, because I understood him not.

But there are other judges, who think I ought not to have translated Chaucer into English, out of a quite contrary notion : they suppose there is a certain veneration due to his old language ; and that it is little less than profanation and sacrilege to alter it. They are farther of opinion, that somewhat of his good sense will suffer in this transfusion, and much of the beauty of his thoughts will infallibly be lost, which appear with more grace in their old habit. Of this opinion was that excellent person, whom I mentioned, the late Earl of Leicester, who valued Chaucer as much as Mr. Cowley despised him. My Lord dissuaded me from this attempt, (for I was thinking of it some years before his death,) and his authority prevailed so far with me, as to defer my undertaking while he lived, in deference to him : yet my reason was not convinced with what he urged against it. If the first end of a writer be to be understood, then, as his language grows obsolete, his thoughts must grow obscure—

*Multa renascentur, quæ nunc cecidere ; cadentque
Quæ nunc sunt in honore vocabula, si volet usus, Quem penes arbitrium est et jus et norma loquendi.*

When an ancient word, for its sound and significancy, deserves to be revived, I have that reasonable veneration tion for antiquity to restore it. All beyond this is superstition. Words are not like landmarks, so sacred as never to be removed ; customs are changed, and even statutes are silently repealed, when the reason ceases for which they were enacted. As for the other part of the argument, that his thoughts will lose of their original beauty by the innovation of words ; in the first place, not only their beauty, but their being is lost, where they are no longer understood, which is the present case. I grant that something must be lost in all transfusion, that is, in all translations ; but the sense will remain, which would otherwise be lost, or at least be maimed, when it is scarce intelligible, and that but to a few. How few are there, who can read Chaucer, so as to understand him perfectly ? And if imperfectly, then with less profit, and no pleasure. It is not for the use of some old Saxon friends, that I have taken these pains with him : let them neglect my version, because they have no need of it. I made it for their sakes, who understand sense and poetry as well as they, when that poetry and sense is put into words which they understand. I will go farther, and dare to add, that what beauties I lose in some places, I give to others which had them not originally : but in this I may be partial to myself ; let the reader judge, and I submit to his decision. Yet I think I have just occasion to complain of them, who because they understand Chaucer, would deprive the greater part of their countrymen of the same advantage, and hoard him up, as misers do their grandam gold, only to look on it themselves, and hinder others from making use of it. In sum, I seriously protest, that no man ever had, or can have, a greater veneration for Chaucer than myself. I have translated some part of his works, only that I might perpetuate his memory, or at least refresh it, amongst my countrymen.

If I have altered him anywhere for the better, I must at the same time acknowledge, that I could have done nothing without him. Facile est inventis addere is no great commendation; and I am not so vain to think 5 I have deserved a greater. I will conclude what I have to say of him singly, with this one remark: A lady of my acquaintance, who keeps a kind of correspondence with some authors of the fair sex in France, has been informed by them, that Mademoiselle de Scudery, who
10 is as old as Sibyl, and inspired like her by the same God of Poetry, is at this time translating Chaucer into modern French. From which I gather, that he has been formerly translated into the old Provençal; for how she should come to understand old English, I know 15 not. But the matter of fact being true, it makes me think that there is something in it like fatality; that, after certain periods of time, the fame and memory of great Wits should be renewed, as Chaucer is both in France and England. If this be wholly chance, 'tis 20 extraordinary; and I dare not call it more, for fear of being taxed with superstition.

Boccace comes last to be considered, who, living in the same age with Chaucer, had the same genius, and followed the same studies. Both writ novels, and each 25 of them cultivated his mother tongue. But the greatest resemblance of our two modern authors being in their familiar style, and pleasing way of relating comical adventures, I may pass it over, because I have translated nothing from Boccace of that nature. In the 30 serious part of poetry, the advantage is wholly on Chaucer's side; for though the Englishman has borrowed many tales from the Italian, yet it appears, that those of Boccace were not generally of his own making, but taken from authors of former ages, and by him only 35 modelled; so that what there was of invention, in either of them, may be judged equal. But Chaucer has refined on Boccace, and has mended the stories, which he has borrowed, in his way of telling; though prose allows more liberty of thought, and the expression is more easy when unconfined by numbers. Our countryman carries weight, and yet wins the race at disadvantage. I desire not the reader should take my word; and, therefore, I will set two of their discourses, on the same subject, in the same light, for every man to judge betwixt them. I translated Chaucer first, and, amongst the rest, pitched on The Wife of Bath's Tale; not daring, as I have said, to adventure on her Prologue, because 'tis too licentious. There Chaucer introduces an old woman, of mean parentage, whom a youthful knight, of noble blood, was forced to marry, and consequently loathed her. The crone being in bed with him on the wedding-night, and finding his aversion, endeavours to win his affection by reason, and speaks a good word for herself, (as who could blame her?) in hope to mollify the sullen bridegroom. She takes her topics from the benefits of poverty, the advantages of old age and ugliness, the vanity of youth, and the silly pride of ancestry and titles, without inherent virtue, which is the true nobility. When I had closed Chaucer, I returned to Ovid, and translated some more of his fables; and, by this time, had so far forgotten The Wife of Bath's Tale, that, when I took up Boccace, unawares I fell on the same argument, of preferring virtue to nobility of blood and titles, in the story of Sigismonda; which I had certainly avoided, for the resemblance of the two discourses, if my memory had not failed me. Let the reader weigh them both; and, if he thinks me partial to Chaucer, 'tis in him to right Boccace.

I prefer, in our countryman, far above all his other stories, the noble poem of Palamon and Arcite, which is of the epic kind, and perhaps not much inferior to the Ilias, or the Æneis. The story is more pleasing than either of them, the manners as perfect, the diction as poetical, the learning as deep and various, and the disposition full as artful: only it includes a greater length of time, as taking up seven years at least; but Aristotle has left undecided the duration of the action; which yet is easily reduced into the compass of a year, by a narration of what preceded the return of Palamon to Athens. I had thought, for the honour of our narra-10 tion, and more particularly for his, whose laurel, though unworthy, I have worn after him, that this story was of English growth, and Chaucer's own: but I was undeceived by Boccace; for, casually looking on the end of 15 his seventh Giornata, I found Dioneo, (under which name he shadows himself,) and Fiametta, (who represents his mistress, the natural daughter of Robert, King of Naples,) of whom these words are spoken: Dioneo e Fiametta gran pezza cantarono insieme d'Arcita, e di

 20 Palemone; by which it appears, that this story was written before the time of Boccace; but the name of its author being wholly lost, Chaucer is now become an original; and I question not but the poem has received many beauties, by passing through his noble hands.
 25 Besides this tale, there is another of his own invention, after the manner of the Provençals, called The Flower and the Leaf, with which I was so particularly pleased, both for the invention and the moral, that I cannot hinder myself from recommending it to the reader.
 30 As a corollary to this preface, in which I have done justice to others, I owe somewhat to myself; not that I think it worth my time to enter the lists with one M——, and one B——, but barely to take notice, that such men there are, who have written scurrilously 35 against me, without any provocation. M——, who is in orders, pretends, amongst the rest, this quarrel to me, that I have fallen foul on priesthood: if I have, I am only to ask pardon of good priests, and am afraid his part of the reparation will come to little. Let him be satisfied, that he shall not be able to force himself upon me for an adversary. I condemn him too much to enter into competition with him. His own translations of Virgil have answered his criticisms on mine. If, (as they say, he has declared in print), he prefers the version of Ogilby to mine, the world has made him the same compliment; for 'tis agreed, on all hands, that he writes even below Ogilby. That, you will say, is not easily to be done; but what cannot M—— bring about? I am satisfied, however, that, while he and I live together, I shall not be thought the worst poet of the age. It looks as if I had desired him underhand to write so ill against me; but upon my honest word I have not bribed him to do me this service, and am wholly guiltless of his pamphlet. 'Tis true, I should be glad if I could persuade him to continue his good offices, and write such another critique on anything of mine; for I find, by experience, he has a great stroke with the reader, when he condemns any of my poems, to make the world have a better opinion of them. He has taken some pains with my poetry; but nobody will be persuaded to take the same with his. If I had taken to the Church, as he affirms, but which was never in my thoughts, I should have had more sense, if not more grace, than to have turned myself out of my benefice, by writing libels on my parishioners. But his account of my manners and my principles are of a piece with his cavils and his poetry; and so I have done with him for ever.

As for the City Bard, or Knight Physician, I hear his quarrel to me is, that I was the author of Absalom and Achitophel, which, he thinks, is a little hard on his fanatic patrons in London.

But I will deal the more civilly with his two poems, because nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead ; and 5 therefore peace be to the Manes of his Arthurs. I will only say, that it was not for this noble Knight that I drew the plan of an epic poem on King Arthur, in my preface to the translation of Juvenal. The Guardian
10 Angels of kingdoms were machines too ponderous for him to manage ; and therefore he rejected them, as Dares did the whirl-bats of Eryx when they were thrown before him by Entellus : yet from that preface, he plainly took his hint ; for he began immediately upon the story, though he had the baseness not to acknow-15 ledge his benefactor, but instead of it, to traduce me in a libel.

I shall say the less of Mr. Collier, because in many things he has taxed me justly ; and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine, which 20 can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them. If he be my enemy, let him triumph ; if he be my friend, as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to draw my pen in the 25 defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one. Yet it were not difficult to prove, that in many places he has perverted my meaning by his glosses, and interpreted my words into blasphemy and bawdry, of which they were not guilty. Besides that,
30 he is too much given to horse-play in his raillery, and comes to battle like a dictator from the plough. I will not say, the zeal of God's house has eaten him up ; but I am sure it has devoured some part of his good manners and civility. It might also be doubted, whether 35 it were altogether zeal which prompted him to this rough manner of proceeding ; perhaps, it became not one of his function to rake into the rubbish of ancient and modern plays : a divine might have employed his pains to better purpose, than in the nastiness of Plautus and Aristophanes, whose examples, as they excuse not me, so it might be possibly supposed, that he read them not without some pleasure. They who have written commentaries on those poets, or on Horace, Juvenal, and Martial, have explained some vices, which, without their interpretation, had been unknown to modern times. Neither has he judged impartially betwixt the former age and us. There is more bawdry in one play of Fletcher's, called The Custom of the Country, than in all ours together. Yet this has been often acted on the stage, in my remembrance. Are the times so much more reformed now, than they were five-and-twenty years ago ? If they are, I congratulate the amendment of our morals. But I am not to prejudice the cause of my fellow poets, though I abandon my own defence : they have some of them answered for themselves ; and neither they nor I can think Mr. Collier so formidable an enemy, that we should shun him. He has lost ground, at the latter end of the day, by pursuing his point too far, like the Prince of Condé, at the battle of Senneph : from immoral plays to no plays, ab abusu ad usum, non valet consequentia. But, being a party, I am not to erect myself into a judge. As for the rest of those who have written against me, they are such scoundrels, that they deserve not the least notice to be taken of them. B — and M — are only distinguished from the crowd by being remembered to their infamy:—

... Demetri, teque, Tigelli, Discipulorum inter jubeo plorare cathedras.

NOTES

DEDICATION OF THIRD MISCELLANY (1693).

Lord Radcliffe, eldest son of Francis Earl of Derwentwater.

P. 2, l. 31. the best poet. Lord Dorset to Mr. Henry Howard on his incomparable, incomprehensible Poem, called the British Princes :—

‘Wit like tierce-claret, when ’t begins to pall, Neglected lies, and ’s of no use at all,
But in its full perfection of decay,
Turns vinegar and comes again in play.’

l. 35. Thus the corruption of a poet is the generation of a critic; v. sup. p. 119, l. 13. This has often been repeated: ‘the readiest-made critics are cut-down poets’ (Landor’s Porson). Cf. Pope, Essay on Criticism, and Disraeli, Lothair.

Zoilus. Cf. Longinus, c. 9 τοὺς ἐκ Κίρκης ἀνομορφουμένους οὓς ὁ Ζωῖλος ἔφη χοιρίδια κλαίοντα.

P. 3, l. 11. he who endeavoured to defame Virgil. Cf. Teuffel, Latin Literature, § 225, 3. Servius on Ecl. 2, 22, hunc versum male distinguens Vergiliomastix vituperat. Carvilius Pictor wrote an Aeneidomastix.

l. 27. to fall on Lucan. Petronius, Satyr. cc. 118–124.

l. 31. Scaliger, on Homer: Poetices Liber V qui et Criticus; cap. 3, Homeri et Virgilii Loca; beginning Homeri epitheta saepe frigida, aut puerilia, aut locis inepta. Vida had before this rebuked the impertinences of Homer, especially in his similes:

‘Sed non Ausonii recte foedissima musca
Militis aequarit numerum, cum plurima mulctram
Pervolitat, neque enim in Latio magno ore sonantem Arma ducesque decet tam viles decidere in res.’

(Poetic. ii.)

Hypercritic. Hypercriticus is the title of Scaliger’s Sixth Book, in which the passage on Claudian occurs, c. 5; already quoted by Dryden.

P. 4, l. 11. Lucan. Scaliger, op. cit. vi. c. 6: 'Proinde ut nimis fortasse libere dicam, interdum mihi latrare, non canere videtur.'

l. 23. non ingeniis. 'Ingeniis non ille favet plauditque sepultis,' Hor. Ep. ii. 1, 88.

P. 5, l. 28. seemingly courted. Cf. Rymer's plan for a tragedy called The Invincible Armado on the model of the Persae of Aeschylus: 'If Mr. Dryden might try his Pen on this Subject, doubtless to an Audience that heartily love their Countrey, and glory in the Vertue of their Ancestors, his imitation of Aeschylus would have better success, and would Pit, Box, and Gallery, far beyond anything now in possession of the Stage, however wrought up by the unimitable Shakespear' (Short View of Tragedy, 1693, p. 17). Rymer is too fond of allusions to Bayes in The Rehearsal; his quotation of the phrase 'Pit, Box, and Gallery,' was unpleasant in this context.

P. 6, l. 4. the quantum mutatus; a reference to the Epistle Dedicatory of Rymer's Short View (to Lord Dorset): 'Three, indeed, of the Epick (the two by Homer and Virgil's Æneids) are reckon'd in the degree of Perfection: But amongst the Tragedies, only the Oedipus of Sophocles. That, by Corneille, and by others, of a Modern Cut, quantum Mutatus!'

l. 21. Perrault: his Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes appeared, the first volume, in 1688; the third volume, containing the fourth Dialogue (en ce qui regarde la Poësie), in 1692. One sentence from this latter may be taken in illustration—'puisque nos bons Romans, comme l'Astrée, où il y a dix fois plus d'invention que dans l'Iliade, le Cleopatre, le Cyrus, le Clelie et plusieurs autres, n'ont aucun des défauts que j'ay remarquez dans les ouvrages des anciens Poëtes, mais ont de mesme que nos poëmes en vers une infinité de beautez toutes nouvelles' (op. cit. p. 149).

P. 7, l. 14. an underplot. Cf. Dedication of Spanish Friar.

l. 27. scriptions. The reference has not yet been traced.

l. 30. Horace, Sat. i. 10, 8 'et est quaedam tamen hic quoque virtus.'

P. 8, l. 18. the daughter of a King. Lady Radcliffe was the daughter of King Charles II and Mary Davies.

P. 9, l. 17. propriety; see above, vol. i. p. 190, l. 12.

l. 24. Mr. Chapman:

'— so the brake

That those translators stuck in, that affect

Their word for word traductions (where they lose

The free grace of their natural dialect,

And shame their authors with a forced glose)

I laugh to see.'—(To the Reader, before his Iliads.)

P. 10, l. 2. by the so-much-admired Sandys. See p. 100, l. 2, and note, and Preface to Ovid's Epistles, 1680, vol. i. p. 230.

• l. 31. turns, both on the words and on the thought. See note on p. 108, l. 17, below.

• P. 11, l. 34. Musas colere, again: see p. 103, l. 9.

P. 12, l. 13. two fragments of Homer. Congreve translated Priam's Lamentation and Petition to Achilles, for the Body of his Son Hector, and the Lamentations of Hecuba, Andromache, and Helen, over the dead Body of Hector.

l. 31. runs off her bias; said of a bowl that does not run true.

P. 14, l. 25. Sir Samuel Tuke: 'A modest man may praise what's not his own.' Prologue to the Adventures of Five Hours (1663); see above, p. 60, l. 17.

A DISCOURSE CONCERNING THE ORIGINAL AND PROGRESS OF SATIRE (1693).

P. 15, l. 10. Titus: . . . amor ac deliciae generis humani; Suetonius.

P. 16, l. 12. Descartes. The 'reformation' is the qualification of the statement by prefixing 'I think.'

P. 18, l. 13. Themistocles. Herodotus, viii. 123.

ll. 30, 31. the best good man:

'For pointed Satire I would Buckhurst choose

The best good man, with the worst-natur'd Muse.'

(Rochester, Allusion to the Tenth Satire of the First Book of Horace.)

P. 19, l. 22. he affects the metaphysics. Probably the origin of Dr. Johnson's 'metaphysical poets'; 'writers of the metaphysical race,' in the Life of Cowley.

P. 21, l. 25. shot at rovers: 'to shoot at rovers,' in archery, is to shoot with an elevation, at a distant mark.

l. 30. my betters, especially Sir William Davenant.

P. 23, ll. 16, 17. dipped in the bath, i. e. in the chemist's bath, used for gilding.

l. 18. the sceptres. 'The four sceptres were placed saltier-wise upon the reverse of guineas, till the gold coinage of his present majesty' (Scott).

P. 24, l. 34. Martial says of him; viii. 18. See note on vol. i. p. 42, l. 8.

P. 25, l. 17. some particular ages, &c. See Essay of Dramatic Poesy, vol. i. p. 36, 'every age has a kind of universal genius . . . the work then being pushed on by many hands must of necessity go forward.'

P. 26, l. 16. Boileau. See above, note on vol. i. p. 181, l. 25.

P. 27, ll. 9-13. Tasso . . . confesses himself to have been too lyrical. Tasso sent his Jerusalem as it was written, in instalments, to Scipione Gonzaga: many of the accompanying letters were published, as Lettere Poetiche in an Appendix to the first edition of his Discorsi, 1587. One of these, dated 15 aprile 1575, speaks of the episode of Olindo and Sofronia, and of Armida, with a kind of apology: 'Ben è vero, ch' in quanto a l'episodio d' Olindo voglio indulgere genio et principi, poichè non v' è altro luogo ove trasporlo; ma di questo non parli Vostra Signoria con essi loro così a la libera. Credo che in molti luoghi troveranno forse alquanto di vaghezza soverchia, ed in particolare ne l' arti di Armida che sono nel quarto: ma ciò non mi dà tanto fastidio quanto il conoscere che 'l trapasso, ch' è nel quinto canto, da Armida a la contenzione di Rinaldo e di Gernando, e 'l ritorno d' Armida non è fatta con molta arte; e 'l modo con che s'uniscono queste due materie è più tosto da romanzo che da poema eroico, come quello che lega solamente co 'l legame del tempo e co 'l legame d'un istante, a mio giudicio assai debil legame.' Tasso returns to the subject in later letters to Scipione Gonzaga, Sept. 2 and Oct. 4, 1575, and on Ap. 3 [1576] he writes: 'Io ho già condannato con irrevocabil sentenza alla morte l'episodio di Sofronia, e perch' in vero era troppo lirico, e perch' al Signor Barga e a gli altri pareva poco connesso, e troppo presto, al giudicio unito de' quali non ho voluto contrafare, e molto più per dare manco occasione ai Frati, che sia possibile.' The episode was omitted in the revised version, Gerusalemme Conquistata, 1593. Dryden had read Tasso's letters; he may have been reminded of this passage by Segrais in the Preface to his Traduction de l'Eneïde (1668), p. 47: '. . . le Tasse, qui ayant connu que son debut par l'Episode d'Olinde et de Sophronie avoit quelque chose d'une affectation qui estoit au dessous de la grandeur de son esprit, et qui luy fit confesser depuis que cet embellissement n'estoit pas en sa place, s'excusoit dans le commencement en disant que cette faute estoit un charme pour le Prince qu'il regardoit comme son Mecene, et qu'il faloit la laisser pour l'amour de luy.' Dryden may also have been thinking of Rapin's censure of Tasso (see above, p. 190): 'Et cette proportion que demande Aristote n'est pas seulement dans la quantité des parties, mais aussi dans la qualité. En quoy le Tasse est fort defectueux, qui mêle dans son Poëme le caractere badin avec le serieux, et toute la force et la majesté de la Poësie heroique à la delicatesses de l'Eglogue et de la Poësie Lyrique.' (Reflexions sur la Poétique.)

l. 25. Owen's Epigrams. John Owen (c. 1560-1622), Fellow of New College; his first instalment of Epigrams was published in 1606, Joannis Audoeni Epigrammatum Libri Tres; in 1624 there were eleven books in all, which went through many editions.

P. 28, l. 4. St. Lewis; by Father Pierre Lemoyne (1602-1672): Saint Louis ou la Sainte Couronne reconquise sur les infidèles (1653).

l. 4. Pucelle; by Jean Chapelain (1595-1674): La Pucelle ou la France delivree: Poëme heroique par M. Chapelain (1656).

l. 5. Alaric; by M. de Scudéry (1601-1667): Alaric ou Rome Vaincue: Poëme heroïque (1654).

P. 29, l. 17. he runs into a flat of thought. See above, Second Miscellany vol. i. p. 269, l. 7.

l. 34. Hannibal Caro. See above, Second Miscellany, vol. i. p. 256, l. 19.

P. 30, l. 11. bias. See Third Miscellany, p. 12, l. 31.

P. 32, l. 1. the machines of our Christian religion. Boileau, L'Art Poétique, iii. 193:

'C'est donc bien vainement que nos Auteurs decens Bannissant de leurs vers ces ornemens recens
Pensent faire agir Dieu, ses Saints et ses Prophetes
Comme ces Dieux éclos du cerveau des Poëtes:
Mettent a chaque pas le Lecteur en Enfer:
N'offrent rien qu'Astaroth, Belzebuth, Lucifer.
De la foy d'un Chrestien les mysteres terribles
D'ornemens égayés ne sont point susceptibles.'

This was directed against Desmarests de Saint Sorlin, the author of Clovis. The question of 'machines' was about this time (1693) being discussed with some liveliness between Boileau and Perrault in connexion with their Odes on the Taking of Namur. Compare Dryden's letter to Dennis, published by Dennis in 1696, written perhaps in March, 1694 (Letter xi. in Scott's Dryden, vol. xviii.): 'If I undertake the translation of Virgil, the little I can perform will shew at least that no man is fit to write after him in a barbarous modern tongue. Neither will his machines be of any service to a Christian poet. We see how ineffectually they have been tried by Tasso, and by Ariosto. It is using them too dully, if we only make devils of his Gods; as if, for example, I would raise a storm, and make use of Æolus, with this only difference of calling him Prince of the Air; what invention of mine would there be in this? or who would not see Virgil through me; only the same trick played over again by a bungling juggler? Boileau has well observed, that 'tis an easy matter in a Christian poem for God to bring the Devil to reason. I think I have given a better hint for new machines in my Preface to Juvenal; where I have particularly recommended two subjects, one of King Arthur's conquest of the Saxons, and the other of the Black Prince in his conquest of Spain. But the Guardian Angels of Monarchies and Kingdoms are not to be touched by every hand: a man must be deeply conversant in the Platonic philosophy to deal with them; and therefore I may reasonably expect, that no poet of our age will presume to handle those machines, for fear of discovering his own ignorance; or if he should, he might perhaps be ingrateful enough not to own me for his benefactor.'

P. 32, l. 5. the two victorious Monarchies. The term 'Fifth-Monarchy man' is, perhaps, the last vestige of the theory of the four successive Empires, Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman, which was derived from the visions of the Book of Daniel. Compare St. Augustine, De Civ. Dei, xx. 23; Sir David Lyndsay, The Monarchie; and H. Fisher, The Medieval Empire, i. p. 19.

P. 34, l. 1. philosophy and the mechanics. Philosophy again in the general sense common in English; see Essay of Dramatic Poesy, p. 36, l. 37.

l. 15. Platonic philosophy. Referred to again in the letter to Dennis, in the same context. Dryden was thinking of the Platonic opinion about daemons as intermediary between Heaven and Earth: Plat. Symp. 202 E; Apuleius, De Deo Socratis; St. Augustine, De Civitate Dei, viii. This doctrine was sometimes applied to the aerial spirits, as by Chaucer in the House of Fame, ii. 421:

'For in this regioun, certein,

Dwelleth many a citezein

Of which that spekethe dan Plato.'

It was also used of the Angels. The idea of tutelar Angels was familiar with the Platonists of Dryden's time. Cf. Henry More, Defence of the Cabbala (1662), p. 48: 'So that it is not improbable but that as the great Angel of the Covenant (he whom Philo calls τῶν ἀγγέλων πρεσβύτατον, τὸν ἀρχάγγελον, λόγον, ἀρχὴν, ὄνομα θεοῦ, that is, the Eldest of the Angels, the Archangel, the Word, the Beginning, the name of God, which is Jehovah) I say, that as he gave Laws to his charge, so the Tutelar Angels of other nations might be Instructors of those that they raised up to be Law-givers to their charge; Though in processe of time the Nations that were at first under the Government of good Angels, by their lewdnesse and disobedience, might make themselves obnoxious to the power and delusion of those ἀπατεῶνες δαίμονες, as they are called, deceitful and tyrannical Devils.'

l. 29. The prince of the Persians. See the Book of Daniel, ch. x. 13: 'But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me' . . .; and 20, 'Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore I came unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come.' Dryden does not say, though he doubtless remembered, what a magnificent adaptation of this had been made by Cowley in his Discourse by way of Vision, concerning the Government of Oliver Cromwell: 'I think I should have gone on, but that I was interrupted by a strange and terrible Apparition, for there appeared to me (arising out of the Earth, as I conceived) the figure of a Man taller than a Giant, or, indeed, the shadow of any Giant in the evening. . . . He held in his right hand a sword that was yet bloody, and nevertheless the motto of it was Pax quaeritur Bello, and in his left hand a thick book, upon the back of which was written in letters of Gold, Acts, Ordinances, Protestations, Covenants, Engagements, Declarations, Remonstrances, &c. Though this sudden, unusual, and dreadful Object might have quelled a greater courage than mine, yet so it pleased God (for there is nothing bolder than a man in a vision) that I was not at all daunted, but asked him resolutely and briefly, What art thou? And he said I am called the North-west Principality, his Highness the Protector of the Common-wealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Dominions belonging thereunto; for I am that Angel to whom the Almighty has committed the government of these three Kingdoms which thou seest from this place,' &c.

P. 36, l. 10. Virgil. The most Platonic passages in Virgil, and those of which Dryden was probably thinking, are the 4th Eclogue and the 6th Book of the Aeneid.

P. 37, l. 21. the Intelligence of the Sun. To every Sphere of the Heavens there is assigned an Intelligence, or Intelligences, which are angels: see Dante, Convivio ii. c. 5; Paradiso ii. 127-129; and Toynbee, Dante Dictionary, s. v. Cielo. Allusions are frequent; e. g. Sir Thomas Browne, Religio Medici i., 'the swing of that wheel not moved by intelligences'; and Donne, speaking of souls and bodies,

'our bodies why do we forbear?

They are ours, though not we; we are

The Intelligences, they the Spheres.'

P. 38, l. 5. King Arthur conquering the Saxons. This was Milton's subject, Mansur 78:

'O mihi si mea sors talem concedat amicum,
Phoebaeos decorasse viros qui tam bene norit,
Siquando indigenas revocabo in carmina reges,
Arturumque etiam sub terris bella moventem,
Aut dicam invictae sociali foedere mensae
Magnanimos heroas, et (O modo spiritus adsit!)
Frangam Saxonicas Britonum sub Marte phalanges.'

l. 10. Don Pedro the Cruel. Don Pedro of Castile is referred to in the Vindication of the Duke of Guise, ten years earlier, with Mariana as authority. 'It is Mariana, I think (but am not certain), that makes the following relation, and let the noble family of Trimmers read their own future in it.' The 'relation' shows that Dryden's projected poem might have been enlivened with modern applications to English politics, besides those which he indicates in this account of his design.

P. 39, l. 33. Ne, forte, pudori. A. P. 406.

P. 41, l. 1. Ut sibi quivis. A. P. 240.

l. 16. Coena dubia. Terence, Phorm. ii. 2, 28; Hor. Sat. ii. 2, 76; 'fine confused feeding.'

P. 43, l. 31. Vida De Arte Poetica (1527) was generally recognized as an authority. Pope, Essay on Criticism, 704:

'A Raphael painted and a Vida sung—
Immortal Vida: on whose honour'd brow
The Poet's bays and Critic's ivy grow,' &c.

P. 44, l. 10. Casaubon. De satyrica Graecorum poesi et Romanorum satyra; Parisiis, 1605.

l. 10. Heinsius. Danielis Heinsii de Satyra Horatiana, in his edition of Horace, 1612.

l. 10. Rigaltius. Nicolas Rigault edited Juvenal, 1616.

l. 10. Dacier. His translation of Horace (Œuvres d'Horace) was published in the years 1681-1689: from his short essay on Satire (Préface sur les Satires d'Horace, t. vi. 1687) Dryden took a number of points and references. It was published in English in 1692 in Gildon's Miscellany Poems, and in 1695 as an Appendix to Bossu on the Epick Poem, and along with Fontenelle on Pastoral.

l. 11. the Dauphin's Juvenal: 'cum interpretatione et notis Lud. Pratei,' 1684.

P. 52, l. 5. Silli. Mentioned by Heinsius and Dacier, as well as Casaubon.

P. 53, l. 15. Satira quidem tota nostra est, Inst. Orat. x. 1, 93.

l. 18. Graecis intacti, &c. Hor. Sat. i. 10, 66.

l. 26. σάθυ; for σάθη. So in Scaliger, Poet. i. 12: 'σάθυ salacitatem dixere veteres'; and so also (a quotation from Scaliger) in the Preface to the Dauphin's Juvenal.

P. 54, l. 16. premisses, to be added to the list of Dryden's French words.

l. 28. olla, or hotchpotch: spelt oleo in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy, p. 60, l. 30.

l. 30. tacked bills: when a measure was tacked to a money-bill, so as to force its acceptance in the House of Lords.

P. 55, l. 28. Tarsians. This reference is from Casaubon, op. cit. i. c. 4—'extemporale genus dicendi Tarsensibus proprium fuisse, tam in soluta quam in astricta numeris oratione'; with quotations from Strabo xiv., and Diogenes Laertius, iv. 58.

l. 30. Scaramucha. The Italian comedy had been much in favour in Paris from the time of Charles IX; the most famous of all Scaramouches, Tiberio Fiorelli, was still alive when Dryden was writing this essay. See Baschet, Les Comédiens italiens à la Cour de France.

P. 57, l. 6. says Livy: all this from Dacier.

P. 59, l. 24. Exodiarii; from Casaubon, Heinsius, and Dacier. Casaubon, ii. c. 1: 'Scholiastes antiquus Juvenalis [in Sat. iii. v. 175] Exodiarius apud veteres in fine ludorum intrabat, quod ridiculum foret: ut quicquid lacrymarum atque tristitiae coegissent ex tragicis affectibus, huius spectaculi visus detergeret.'

P. 62, l. 3. Quid? cum est Lucilius ausus, &c. Hor. Sat. ii. 1, 62.

l. 34. Diomedes the grammarian. See Casaubon, op. cit. ii. c. 3.

P. 64, l. 2. Dousa, i. e. van der Does. Janus Dousa, poet and commentator (1545-1604), had two sons who were scholars; the second, Franciscus Dousa, edited the fragments of Lucilius.

l. 18. Varronian Satire. All this from Casaubon, ii. c. 2, whom Dacier copied.

l. 27. Quintilian, x. 1.

P. 65, l. 15. Tully, in his Academics, i. 2, quoted by Casaubon, l. c.

l. 29. philology: cf. Preface to Fables, p. 254, l. 26.

P. 66, l. 2. σπουδογέλοιοι, 'blending jest with earnest.' Casaubon, l. c., on Menippus quotes Strabo xvi. ἐκ τῶν Γαδάρων ἦν Μελέαγρος καὶ Μένιππος ὁ σπουδογέλοιος. The examples of Varronian satire noted by Casaubon are those of Petronius, Seneca, Lucian, Julian, Martianus Capella, and Boetius.

l. 31. Petronius Arbiter. 'That bungling supplement to Petronius'; 'that scandal to all fogeries'; Bentley on Phalaris. (Pet. Arb. Satyricon cum fragmentis Albae Graecae recuperatis anno 1688. Col. Arg. 1691; Budae 1697.)

P. 67, l. 4. the mock deification: 'Αποκοκύντωσις, or the Translation of the Emperor among the Pumpkins.

l. 7. Barclay's Euphormio. See above, note on vol. i. p. 6, l. 10. Euphormionis Lusinini Satyricon began to be published in 1603; the first part was dedicated to King James. Five parts, with a key, &c., were published in 1629.

l. 7. a volume of German authors; most probably the Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum.

P. 69, ll. 28-31. Casaubon's Persius was published in 1605; Steluti's at Rome in 1630 (text, Italian translation in blank verse, and commentary in Italian).

P. 70, l. 13. scabrous, in the sense of rough.

l. 21. a Scotch gentleman; David Wedderburn of Aberdeen, whose edition of Persius, with a commentary, was published in 8vo at Amsterdam, 1664 (Scott).

P. 73, l. 28. Holyday. Barten Holyday, D.D., of Christ Church, some time archdeacon of Oxford (1593-1661), published his Persius in 1616; his Juvenal was not published till 1673, along with the fourth edition of Persius. Holyday was the author of Τεχνονομία, or the Marriages of the Arts, a Comedie, 1618, 4°; acted in Christ Church Hall on Feb. 13, 1618, and again at Woodstock in 1621 before the king, who tried in vain to get away before the end of the entertainment.

P. 74, l. 7. Aeschines. Ctes. 167 ταῦτα δὲ τί ἐστιν, ὦ κίναδος; ῥήματα ἢ θαύματα;

l. 22. χελώνης. Suidas is quoted for this proverb by Stephanus, s. v. ἡ δὲ χελώνης κρέα φαγεῖν ἢ μὴ φαγεῖν; quoniam sc. ὀλίγα βροθέντα στρόφους ποιεῖ πολλά δὲ καθαίρει. Not snail, but turtle is the subject of the prescription.

P. 76, l. 25. Bishop of Salisbury: Burnet. 'The Satyrical Poets, Horace, Juvenal, and Persius, may contribute wonderfully to give a man a Detestation of Vice, and a Contempt of the common Methods of mankind; which they have set out in such true Colours, that they must give a very generous Sense to those who delight in reading them often. Persius his Second Satyr may well pass for one of the best Lectures in Divinity.' (A Discourse of the Pastoral Care, written by the Right Reverend Father in God Gilbert Lord Bishop of Sarum; London, 1692; p. 162.)

P. 77, l. 35. a witty friend of mine. Wycherley, whose father refused to pay his debts.

P. 83, ll. 5-7. Petronius . . . ne sententiae, &c., c. 118.

P. 85, l. 3. the Plain Dealer. Wycherley again; cf. Apology for Heroic Poetry, p. 182, l. 5, above.

l. 12. on carpet ground. Cf. Second Miscellany, p. 255, l. 31.

P. 86, l. 19. Virgil, Eclogue, 3, 26.

P. 91, l. 35. secuit urbem. Persius, Sat. i. 114.

P. 92, l. 6. Holyday; above, p. 73, l. 28.

l. 19. Stapylton, Sir Robert, author of The Slighted Maid (above, vol. i. p. 209, l. 5, note, published The first six Satyrs of Juvenal at Oxford in 1644, and the complete version, His Satyrs rendered in English Verse, in 1647; London, 8°; 'with seventeen designs in picture,' London, 1660, fol.

P. 93, l. 21. Jack Ketch. See Macaulay's History, ch. 5 (execution of Monmouth).

P. 94, l. 15. ense rescindendum. Virgil, Georg. iii. 452:

'Non tamen ulla magis praesens fortuna laborum est

Quam si quis ferro potuit rescindere summum

Ulceris os: alitur vitium vivitque tegendo,' &c.

P. 95, l. 23. honest Mr. Swan: 'honest Mr. Sw----' is also cited in Dennis's Letters, 1696, p. 65 (a letter on Quibbling, to Mr. — at Will's Coffee-house in Covent-Garden). See also the Memoirs of Scriblerus, c. 7: 'His good fortune directed him to one of the most singular endowments, whose name was Conradus Crambe, who by the father's side was related to the Crouches of Cambridge, and his mother was cousin to Mr. Swan, Gamester and Punster of the City of London.' He is mentioned by Swift, Remarks on Tindal, 1708: 'the formality of laying hand over head on a man.' A pun; but an old one. I remember when Swan made that pun first he was severely checked for it.' Also in An Examination of certain Abuses, Corruptions, and Enormities in the City of Dublin, 1732. Spectator, No. 61. 'Upon enquiry, I found my learned friend had dined that day with Mr. Swan, the famous punster; and desiring him to give me some account of Mr. Swan's conversation, he told me that he generally talked in the Paronomasia; that he sometimes gave in to the Ploce, but that in his humble opinion he shined most in the Antanaclassis.' Barrow, Sermon xiv., Against Foolish Talking and Jestings, shows some tolerance for the figure of Paronomasia, and other ornaments 'wherein the lepid way doth consist.'

P. 97, l. 5. statues of the Sileni. This is the famous comparison (Symposium 215 A) which is otherwise rendered by Rabelais in the Prologue to Gargantua, and after him quoted by Bacon in the Advancement of Learning, i. 3. 8: 'I refer them also to that which Plato said of his master Socrates, whom he compared to the gallipots of apothecaries, which on the outside had apes and owls and antiques, but contained within sovereign and precious liquors and confections,' &c.

P. 99, l. 21. Mr. Maidwell.[?] Lewis Maidwell, author of The Loving Enemies, 1680. His book of instructions for reading a course of Mathematics is referred to in a letter of Dryden's young friend, Mr. Walter Moyle.

P. 100, l. 33. or rather description; see vol. i. p. 36, l. 9 (note). The definition of Satire is given in the first book of the Dissertation of Heinsius; p. 54 in the Elzevir of 1629.

P. 101, l. 9. consisting in a low familiar way of speech. 'Sicut humiliter ac familiariter, ita acriter partim ac dicaciter, partim urbano ac jocoso constans sermone.' Heinsius, loc. cit.

l. 17. grande sophos. An oversight for the grande aliquid of Persius, Sat. i. 14. grande sophos, 'the loud bravo,' occurs several times in Martial; once in an epigram which was a household word at one time in Westminster School; see Dasent, Annals of an Eventful Life, c. 12.

'Audieris cum grande sophos, dum basia captas,

Ibis ab excusso missus in astra sago' (4).

Also i. 50: 'Mercetur alius grande et insanum sophos'; and vi. 48: 'Quod tam grande sophos clamat tibi turba togata, Non tu, Pomponi, cena diserta tua est.'

P. 101, l. 23. pad, saddle.

P. 102, l. 32. underplot. See Dedication of the Spanish Friar, and of the Third Miscellany.

P. 103, l. 1. Copernican system. See above, p. 225, l. 37, note. Sir William Temple writing On Ancient and Modern Learning a few years before this, is not quite sure of the Copernican system: 'There is nothing new in Astronomy, to vie with the Ancients, unless it be the Copernican system; nor in Physic, unless Harvey's circulation of the blood. But whether either of these be modern discoveries, or derived from old fountains is disputed: nay it is so too whether they are true or no; for though reason may seem to favour them more than the contrary opinions, yet sense can very hardly allow them; and to satisfy mankind both these must concur. But if they are true, yet these two great discoveries have made no change in the conclusions of Astronomy, nor in the practice of Physic, and so have been of little use to the world, though perhaps of much honour to the authors.'

l. 4. Mascardi (Agostino). 'Cameriere d'Honore di N. Sig. Urbano Ottavo'; see his Prose Volgari, Ven. 1630 (the Preface is dated 1625), Discorso Settimo: dell' Unità della Favola Drammatica: a good specimen of formal criticism, and of the use of such common-places as Nature and Imitation: 'the imitative arts follow in their operation the custom of Nature; now the custom of Nature is at times to follow two ends, one principal and one accessory.' Unity he finds to be fruitful of debate in literature: 'This is the point on which so many contests of the modern Academies are found to turn, this the trenchant weapon of the partisans of Tasso against Lodovico Ariosto; under this law Ariosto is banished, along with the other writers of Romances, from the senate of the Epic Poets.'

l. 6. Il Pastor Fido. See above, vol. i. p. 273, l. 7.

P. 105, l. 17. Hudibras. Dryden seems to have borne no grudge to Butler for his charges against the Heroic Play. Compare The Hind and the Panther:

"Unpitied Hudibras, your champion friend Has shown how far your charities extend":
This lasting verse shall on his tomb be read
"He shamed you living, and upbraids you dead."

Compare also the well-known phrase in Dryden's letter to Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rochester (? August, 1683): 'Tis enough for one age to have neglected Mr. Cowley, and starv'd Mr. Butler.'

P. 106, l. 31. Tassoni and Boileau. Compare Dean Lockier's account of his visit to Will's, given in Spence's Anecdotes: 'I was about seventeen when I first came up to town, an odd-looking boy, with short rough hair, and that sort of awkwardness which one always brings up at first out of the country with one. However, in spite of my bashfulness and appearance, I used now and then to thrust myself into Will's to have the pleasure of seeing the most celebrated wits of that time, who then resorted thither. The second time that ever I was there, Mr. Dryden was speaking of his own things, as he frequently did, especially of such as had been lately published. "If anything of mine is good," says he, "'tis Mac-Flecno, and I value myself the more upon it, because it is the first piece of ridicule written in heroics." On hearing this I plucked up my spirit so far as to say in a voice but just loud enough to be heard, that Mac-Flecno was a very fine poem, but that I had not imagined it to be the first that ever was writ that way. On this Dryden turned short upon me, as surprised at my interposing; asked me how long I had been a dealer in poetry, and added with a smile: "Pray, sir, what is it that you did imagine to have been writ so before?" I named Boileau's Lutrin and Tassoni's Secchia Rapita, which I had read, and knew that Dryden had borrowed some strokes from each. "'Tis true," said Dryden, "I had forgot them." A little after Dryden went out; and in going spoke to me again, and desired me to come and see him the next day. I was highly delighted with the invitation; went to see him accordingly, and was well acquainted with him after as long as he lived.'

II. 31, 32. Alessandro Tassoni, of Modena, 1565-1635. The Secchia Rapita was published in 1622; translated by Perrault, Le Scau Enlevé, 1678. There are several editions of the Italian text printed in England; one in 1710, with a translation by Ozell. Tassoni's critical writings are an important section of the documents for 'Ancients and Moderns,' and may have been known to Dryden (Quisiti, Modena, 1608; Dieci Libri di Pensieri Diversi, Roma, 1620, &c.).

I. 33. The Lutrin of Boileau was published in the 1674 edition of his works; four cantos, along with L'Art Poétique; the fifth and sixth cantos were added in 1683.

I. 33. Teofilo Folengo, Merlinus Cocaius, the chief of all poets in the Macaronic language, born in 1491; his poems were published in Venice, in 1517 and 1520; they are the Zanitonella, the Maccaronicum, which is Baldus, the Moschæa, or War of the Flies and Emmets, and Epigrams. He also wrote the Orlandino per Limerno Pilocco da Mantova, Ven. 1526; and the history of his life in the Chaos del triperuno (i.e. Merlinus, Limerno, Teofilo) overo dialogo de le tre etadi da Teofilo Folengo da Mantova, Venice, 1527. Baldus is a noble hero brought up in the cottage of a villen, where his youth is nurtured in the favourite romances, Sir Bevis, Ogier the Dane, &c.:

‘Legerat Anchroiam, Tribisondam, Gesta Danesi, Antonaque Bovum, mox tota Realea Francae

Vidit ut Angelicam sapiens Orlandus amavit.
At mox ut nudo pergebat corpore mattus,
Cui tulit Astolfus cerebrum de climate Lunae.’

So Baldus goes out on adventures, with his friendly giant Fracasse and other companions. The Orlando Furioso had been published the year before, in 1516. A translation of Folengo’s work was published in Paris in 1606: Histoire maccaronique de Merlin Coccaie, prototype de Rabelais; plus l’horrible bataille advenue entre les mouches et les fourmis.

P. 107, l. 2. stanza of eight; the Italian octave, ottava rima.

l. 9. Scarron (Paul), 1610-1660, author of Don Japhet d’Arménie and other dramatic versions of ‘Spanish plots,’ and of the Roman Comique, published his Virgile Travesti in 1648-53. It was imitated in England by Charles Cotton; Scarronides, or Virgile Travestie. 1664, &c. (‘a mock Poem’).

P. 108, l. 17. turns of words and thoughts. Compare the Dedication of the Æneis, p. 219 (speaking of the French poets), ‘the turn on thoughts and words is their chief talent; but the Epic Poem is too stately to receive those little ornaments,’ &c. And Preface to Fables, p. 257: ‘As for the turn of words, in which Ovid particularly excels all poets, they are sometimes a fault and sometimes a beauty. . . . Chaucer writ with more simplicity and followed Nature more closely than to use them.’ Compare also Dr. Herford’s Introduction to Spenser’s Shepherd’s Calendar. Butler’s Characters, A Quibbler (written probably about 1665): ‘There are two sorts of quibbling, the one with words and the other with sense, like the rhetorician’s figuræ dictionis et figuræ sententiæ—the first is already cried down, and the other as yet prevails, and is the only elegance of our modern poets, which easy judges call easiness; but having nothing in it but easiness, and being never used by any lasting wit, will in wiser times fall to nothing of itself.’

l. 22. Sir George Mackenzie, of Rosehaugh (1636-1691), Lord Advocate for Scotland; see Wandering Willie’s Tale in Redgauntlet: ‘the Bloody Advocate Mackenzie, who for his worldly wit and wisdom had been to the rest as a God.’ His character and that of his writings have been explained by Mr. W. A. Raleigh in Sir Henry Craik’s English Prose Selections, vol. iii. p. 261; and by Mr. Taylor Innes (Studies in Scottish History, 1892). He wrote Aretina or the Serious Romance, 1661; Religio Stoici, Edin., 1663; Moral Gallantry, a Discourse proving that the Point of Honour obliges a Man to be Virtuous, Edin., 1667; Institutions of the Laws of Scotland, Edin., 1684; and other works.

P. 109, l. 22. Mr. Walsh. William Walsh, 1663-1708: 'He is known more by his familiarity with greater men than by anything done or written by himself' (Johnson). Dryden had written a Preface for Walsh's Dialogue concerning Women, 1691, in which the author of the Dialogue is highly praised.

P. 110, l. 26. prosodia. Dryden explains in the Dedication of the Æneis that he had collected materials for an English Prosody. Compare also the Preface to Albion and Albanus for his interest in syllables.

PARALLEL OF POETRY AND PAINTING (1695).

P. 117, l. 19. Bellori (Giovanni Pietro) published his Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, &c. (Vite de' Pittori), at Rome in 1672, with a Dedication to Colbert, who was also the patron of Fresnoy's poem, De Arte Graphica.

P. 118, l. 13. This Idea, &c.; in the original a conceit: 'questa Idea, overo Dea della Pittura.'

l. 23. Cicero. 'Ut igitur in formis et figuris est aliquid perfectum et excellens cuius ad excogitatam speciem imitando referuntur ea quae sub oculis ipsa cadunt, sic perfectae eloquentiae speciem animo videmus, effigiem auribus quaerimus.' Orator 9.

l. 30. Proclus. Proclo nel Timeo, i.e. Proclus in his commentary on the Timaeus.

P. 119, l. 12. Maximus Tyrius. His Discourses, Διαλέξεις, were edited by H. Stephanus in 1557, and by Heinsius in 1607. He lived in the second century.

l. 25. Caravaggio, &c. 'Come in questi nostri tempi Michel Angelo da Caravaggio fu troppo naturale, dipinse i simili, e Bamboccio i peggiori.'

l. 28. drawn the worst likeness; i.e. drawn people at their worst. In the account of Modern Masters appended to Dryden's Art of Painting, p. 326, there is an account of Bamboccio: 'Pieter van Laer, commonly call'd Bamboccio or the Beggar-painter' (1584-1644). 'He had an admirable Gusto in colouring, was very judicious in the ordering of his Pieces, nicely just in his Proportions, and onely to be blam'd, for that he generally affected to represent Nature in her worst Dress, and follow'd the Life too close, in most of his Compositions.'

P. 120, l. 7. Seneca. The rhetorician: 'Non vidit Phidias Iovem, fecit tamen velut tonantem, nec stetit ante oculos eius Minerva: dignus tamen illa arte animus et concepit deos et exhibuit.' Controv. x. 5. 8; cf. Cic. Orat. 9.

P. 120, l. 9. Apollonius of Tyana; his Life was written by Philostratus.

l. 14. Alberti. One of the great Florentine humanists of the fifteenth century; wrote on architecture, education, and other branches of learning.

l. 19. Castiglione, Baldassarre, the author of Il Cortigiano. Raphael painted his Galatea in 1514 for the villa of Agostino Chigi the banker, which is now the Farnesina. Raphael's words are: 'per dipingere una bella mi bisogna veder più belle . . . ma essendo carestia e di buoni giudici e di belle donne, io mi servo di certa idea che mi viene alla mente. Se questa ha in sè alcuna eccellenza d'arte, io non so: ben m' affatico d'averla.'

l. 24. Guido Reni; his St. Michael is in one of the Chapels of the Capuchins' church at Rome (Santa Maria della Concezione).

P. 121, l. 2. the contrary idea. 'Si trova anche l'idea della bruttezza, ma questa lascio di spiegare nel demonio'; i.e. 'I forbear to render this in the picture of the Fiend.'

l. 20. Cyllarus. Ovid, Metam. xii. 393 sq.

l. 29. Apelles. 'Si Venerem Cous nusquam posuisset Apelles.'
Art. Amand. iii. 401.

P. 123, l. 20. Philostratus; the younger.

l. 20. This Proem is quoted by Bellori, after his own Preface to the Lives of the Painters.

P. 124, l. 27. merchants; 'i.e. merchant vessels. The passage seems to be so worded as to contain a sneer at the negligence of King William's government in protecting the trade. Perhaps Dryden alluded to the misfortune of Sir Francis Wheeler, in 1693, who being sent with a convoy into the Mediterranean, was wrecked in the Bay of Gibraltar.' Scott.

P. 126, l. 17. St. Catharine; in Tyrannic Love.

P. 127, l. 11. Lentulus, in the apocryphal Epistle to the Roman Senate. Fabricius, Cod. Apoc. N. T. t. i. p. 301.

P. 128, l. 10. The Marquis of Normanby's opinion; in the Essay on Poetry: 'Reject that vulgar error which appears

So fair of making perfect characters;

There's no such thing in Nature, and you'll draw

A faultless Monster, which the world ne'er saw.'

P. 129, l. 8. Catullus; quoted by Dryden in the Dedication of Limberham:

'castum esse decet pium poetam Ipsum; versiculos nihil necesse est.'

l. 14. Vita proba est. Martial, i. 5.

P. 130, l. 2. Annibale Caracci, 1560-1609. His work in the Farnese Palace is described by Bellori in detail; the Choice of Hercules (Ercole Bruto) at p. 33 of vol. i. of the Vite de' Pittori.

P. 131, l. 35. Poussin.

P. 132, l. 20. kermis; a fair (Dutch).

l. 21. snick or snee. The subject is noted by Sir Joshua Reynolds at Amsterdam, a picture by Jan Steen in the cabinet of M. Gart (Works, ed. Malone, ii. p. 365). Compare Marvell, The Character of Holland, l. 96:

'When, stagg'ring upon some land, snick and sneer,
They try like statuaries if they can Carve out each other's Athos to a man;
And carve in their large bodies where they please,
The arms of the United Provinces.'

l. 23. Lazar. Above, vol. i. p. 18, l. 18.

P. 133, l. 12. Covent Garden fops. A fop was more of a booby and less of a dandy in Dryden's time.

l. 23. As Sir William D'Avenant observes: 'and he that means to govern so mournfully (as it were, without any Musick in his Dominion) must lay but light burdens on his Subjects; or else he wants the ordinary wisdom of those who, to their Beasts that are much loaden, whistle all the day to encourage their Travail' (Preface to Gondibert, p. 18, in the folio).

P. 134, l. 3. an eminent French critic. Not identified.

P. 136, l. 20. The principal and most important:

'Praecipua imprimis Artisue potissima pars est
Nosse quid in rebus Natura creavit ad Artem Pulchrius, idque Modum iuxta Mentemque Vetustam.'

De Arte Graph. v. 37 sqq.

P. 138, l. 4. Mr. Walter Moyle (1672-1721). His writings were edited, with an account of his life, by Anthony Hammond, in 1727. 'From a set of Company of Learned and Ingenious Gentlemen, who frequented Manwayring's Coffee-house in Fleet-street, he fell much into the Conversation of Gentlemen at the Grecian Coffee-house near the Temple. . . . To be nearer the more entertaining part of the Town, he removed to Covent-Garden. Here it was (as Mr. Dryden declares) that the Learning and Judgement, above his Age, which every one discovered in Mr. Moyle, were Proofs of those Abilities he has shewn in his Country's Service, when he was chose to serve it in the Senate, as his Father, Sir Walter, had done.' A footnote here refers to Dryden's Life of Lucian. There are letters to Mr. Walter Moyle in Dennis's collection of Letters, 1696.

P. 139, l. 15. Lopez de Vega. Lopez is a frequent mistake for Lope; the patronymic for the Christian name. Corneille, however, and generally the French before Voltaire, write accurately Lope. The reference is to Lope's Nuevo Arte de hacer Comedias (Obras Sueltas, iv. p. 405), his apology for neglecting the rules, and his account of the best rules to be followed by the authors who wish to succeed with the public. 'None of them all can I reckon more barbarian than myself, since I am daring to give precepts all counter to Art, and letting myself swim with the vulgar tide, for Italy and France to call me ignorant. But what can I do, when I have written (counting the one finished this week) four hundred and eighty-three comedies, and all but six of them heinous offenders against Art? I stand by what I have written, and recognize that though the other way were better, yet they would not have pleased as well; for often that which breaks the rules is thereby pleasant to the taste.'

P. 140, l. 10. similes. See p. 202, l. 13.

*P. 142, l. 9. Another. Lee.

l. 17. Let every member:

'Singula membra suo capiti conformia fiant.'

De Arte Graph. v. 126.

l. 28. Morecraft is the usurer in the Scornful Lady, whose conversion is referred to in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy, p. 66, l. 11: 'Cutting,' i.e. swaggering; a cutter is a 'roaring blade.'

'He's turn'd gallant.'

'Gallant!'

'Ay, gallant, and is now call'd Cutting Morecraft.'

Act v. sc. 4.

'Is Pompey grown so malepert, so frampel?

The only cutter about ladies' honours,

And his blade soonest out?'

Wit at Several Weapons, Act iii. sc. 1.

l. 33. The principal figure:

'Prima Figurarum seu Princeps Dramatis ultro

Prosiliat media in Tabula sub lumine primo

Pulchrior ante alias, reliquis nec operta Figuris.'

De Arte Graph. v. 129.

P. 144, l. 8. Esther, 1689; written at the suggestion of Madame de Maintenon for the pupils of her foundation of St. Cyr: 'La célèbre maison de Saint-Cyr ayant été principalement établie pour élever dans la piété un fort grand nombre de jeunes demoiselles rassemblées de tous les endroits du royaume,' &c. (Racine, in the Preface to Esther). Racine had begun to attract English playwrights: Otway, Titus and Berenice, 1677; Crowne, Andromache, 1675.

P. 145, l. 13. The Slighted Maid, by Sir R. Stapylton; see above, vol. i. p. 209, l. 5.

l. 30. Venice Preserved, or a Plot Discovered, 1682. Acted at the Duke's Theatre.

P. 146, l. 13. says Aristotle. Poet. c. 25 (p. 1460, l. 33): ὅλον καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἔφη αὐτὸς μὲν οἶους δεῖ ποιεῖν, Εὐριπίδην δὲ οἷοι εἶσι.

l. 15. drew them worse: this case is not considered by Aristotle in the passage of which Dryden is thinking.

l. 20. that part of Ædipus: the first and third Acts.

l. 31. the Gothic manner. De Arte Graph., l. 240:

'Denique nil sapiat Gotthorum barbara trito

Ornamenta modo, saeculorum et monstra malorum,' &c.

P. 147, l. 11. Du Fresnoy tells us; op. cit., l. 137 sqq.

l. 30. turns of words upon the thought. See p. 108, and note.

l. 33. lena sororis. De Arte Graph., l. 261:

'Haec quidem ut in Tabulis fallax sed grata Venustas

Et complementum Graphidos (mirabile visu)

Pulchra vocabatur, sed subdola Lena Sororis.'

P. 149, l. 26. the first verses of the Sylva; quoted by Dryden already in the Dedication of the Spanish Friar.

P. 151, l. 4. the pencil thrown luckily—a favourite commonplace: it appears, e.g. at the beginning of the Preface to Ibrahim ou l'Illustre Bassa, 1641. The painter was Nealcès.

l. 11. Bristol-stone; see p. 227, l. 18, and note.

l. 28. manum de tabula. Another commonplace, from Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxv. 10: 'Protogenes curae supra modum anxiae qui manum de tabula nesciret tollere'; quoted by Rapin, Reflexions sur la Poétique: 'C'est un grand défaut que de ne pouvoir finir, dont Apelle blâmoit si fort Protogene.' Nocere nimiam diligentiam, from the same context, is also quoted here by Rapin, in the margin.

DEDICATION OF THE ÆNEIS (1697).

P. 154, l. 1. A Heroic Poem, truly such. See p. 181, l. 6, and note.

P. 155, l. 5. the trifling novels; the episodic stories in the Orlando Furioso. Novel (accented on the last syllable) had of course still the meaning of the Italian novella, French nouvelle—'a short story generally of love.'

P. 156, ll. 10-15. [I can think of nothing . . . Jove was born there]. All this is left out in the third edition; I have not been able to find a copy of the second.

P. 157, l. 9. divinæ particulam auræ. Flor. Sat. ii. 2, l. 79.

l. 33. Corneille himself . . . was inclined to think. The troubles of Corneille have been alluded to already, in the Essay of Dramatic Poesy. Compare his Third Discourse: 'pour moi je trouve qu'il y a des sujets si mal-aisés à renfermer en si peu de tems, que non seulement je les accorderois les vingt-quatre heures entières, mais je me servirois même de la licence que donne ce philosophe de les excéder un peu, et les pousserai sans scrupule jusqu'à trente.' See also Corneille et la Poétique d'Aristote, by M. Jules Lemaitre.

P. 158, l. 20. Chymical medicines; essences, strong medicines given in small doses; e. g. opium, arsenic, tartar emetic.

l. 23. Galenic decoctions; of simples, generally of many herbs together, in a large drench, as prescribed by the qualified physicians.

The terms belong to a controversy (more furious than any battles of the books) between the Spagirists or Paracelsians, who used chemical medicines, and the School of Paris which imposed an oath on its pupils never to use anything of the kind. I am indebted for information on this subject to Professor John Ferguson of Glasgow.

²⁰ P. 159, l. 1. orbs = orbits.

P. 161, l. 16. Tryphon the stationer. Martial, iv. 72, xiii. 3, Bibliopola Tryphon.

l. 18. in the ruelle; properly the space or 'lane' between the bed and the wall; later, the reception of visitors at the lady's toilette; then, generally, any party of ladies and gentlemen that pretended to wit. For the original sense, compare Chappuzeau, Le Cercle de Femmes, Act i. sc. 3 (about 1655):

'Et des Cartes tout proche, avecques Campanelle, Que ie viens de laisser ouverts dans ma ruelle.'

For the later meaning, Sarasin, Discours de la Tragedie (Preface to Scudéry, L'Amour Tyrannique), 1639: 'Nous sommes en un temps où tout le monde croit avoir droit de juger de la Poésie, de laquelle Aristote a fait son chef d'œuvre; où les ruelles des femmes sont les Tribunaux des plus beaux ouvrages; où ce qui fut autrefois la vertu de peu de personnes devient la maladie du peuple, et le vice de la multitude.'

P. 162, l. 7. my two masters; Homer and Virgil.

l. 14. your Essay of Poetry. First published in 1682.

l. 31. puny, i. e. puisé, junior.

P. 164, l. 9. Scaliger the fader. On the contrary, Scaliger in the Epistle before his Postice, says: 'Nam et Horatius Artem quum inscripsit adeo sine ulla docet arte ut Satyrae propius totum opus illud esse videatur.'

l. 34. Maevius. The bad poet's opening line, Fortunam Priami, &c., was commonly attributed to Maevius. D. Heinsius quotes for this opinion the Anticlaudianus (i. c. 5), of Alanus de Insulis, the Universal Doctor, and supposes it derived from some old commentator—'nam unde id illi in mentem saeculo tam barbaro?' Cf. Satirical Poets of the Twelfth Century, ed. T. Wright, Rolls Series:

'Illic pannoso plebescit carmine noster
Ennius, et Priami fortunas intonat illic Maevius; in coelos audens os ponere mutum.'

The place of Fortunam Priami is taken in Boileau's Art Poétique by the opening line of Scudéry's Alaric:

• 'Je chante le vainqueur des vainqueurs de la terre.'

P. 165, l. 2. as Horace would tell you from behind, i. e. without himself joining in the epic competition.

l. 6. Saint Louis, &c. See the Preface to Juvenal, p. 28, and note.

l. 16. machining persons, i. e. supernatural agents like the gods in Homer.

l. 25. Segrais. His Preface is the source of a good deal of this Essay of Dryden's. Jean Regnaud de Segrais (1624-1701), some time in the service of Mademoiselle de Montpensier, admitted to the circle of the Hôtel de Rambouillet before he was elected to the Academy, is perhaps best known through his association with the novels of Madame de Lafayette. Zayde was published under his name in 1670. There is a collection of Segraisiana. His Énéide was published in 1668.

P. 166, l. 28. Macrobius: in the Saturnalia, books v. and vi.

l. 30. Tanneguy le Fevre, of Saumur, 'Tanaquillus Faber' (1615-1672), a well-known classical scholar, whom Gibbon mentions with respect, editor of Longinus, Lucretius, Aelian, Eutropius, Terence, Horace, Virgil, and others; father of Madame Dacier, Anna Tanaquilli Fabri filia.

l. 30. Valois. Dryden perhaps means the Valesiana (1694) ou les Pensées critiques, historiques et morales, et les Poésies Latines de Monsieur de Valois Conseiller du Roi et Historiographe de France. There are a few notes on Virgil in this collection; one on discrepancies about the age of Iulus. M. de Valois (Hadrianus Valesius) was born in 1607, and died in 1692.

l. 31. another whom I name not. St. Évremond is probably the name which Dryden, out of respect, forbore to mention in this place. See pp. 184, 202, and notes.

P. 167, l. 30. Persian; in later editions 'Assyrian or Median.'

P. 169, l. 5. Stavo ben. Perhaps the first appearance in England of this quotation; repeated in the Spectator, No. 25.

l. 34. Dante. References to Dante are not frequent in this age; there is little to note between Davenant's disrespectful mention of him in the Preface to Gondibert, and Gray's temperate appreciation. Mr. Saintsbury thinks that the interpretation of his dantem jura Catonem, a little further on, is due to Dante's Cato at the beginning of the Purgatorio. Dryden, however, in his note on the passage mentions Montaigne and not Dante as his authority.

P. 172, l. 15. Bochartus. His dissertation on the question 'whether Aeneas was ever in Italy,' dated 'de Caen ce 20 Decembre 1663,' is given by Segrais in his Énéide.

P. 173, l. 21. animamque in vulnere ponit. Georgic. iv., l. 238 (animasque . . . ponunt):

'Prone to Revenge, the Bees a wrathful Race,
When once provok'd assault th' Agressor's Face;
And through the purple Veins a passage find,
There fix their Stings and leave their Souls behind.'

Dryden.

P. 174, l. 30. Priamus. In the first edition Atis. After 'Second Book,' the first edition reads, 'Atis then the favourite companion of Aecanius had a better right than he, though I know he was introduced by Virgil to do honour to the family from whom Julius Caesar was descended on the mother's side.' The correction is made in the third edition. I have not been able to find the reading of the second.

P. 178, l. 6. the author of the Dauphin's Virgil; Ruæus (Charles de La Rue); his edition of Virgil appeared in 1675; the passage recollected by Dryden here is 'Segresius in egregia Præfatione ad Gallicam Æneidos interpretationem.'

l. 17. Tasso. On the relations of the two characters, Godfrey and Rinaldo, see Tasso's own views in the Allegoria del Poema, printed in the first editions of the Jerusalem Delivered (1581); and Spenser's, in the Letter to Sir Walter Raleigh: 'In which I have followed all the antique Poets historicall: first Homere, who in the Persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled a good governour and a vertuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseis; then Virgil, whose like intention was to doe in the person of Aeneas; after him Ariosto comprised them both in his Orlando; and lately Tasso dissevered them again, and formed both parts in two persons, namely, that part which they in Philosophy call Ethice, or virtues of a private man, coloured in his Rinaldo; the other, named Politice, in his Godfredo.'

P. 182, l. 10. invulnerable. 'Dryden had forgot, what he must certainly have known, that the fiction of Achilles being invulnerable, bears date long posterior to the days of Homer. In the Iliad he is actually wounded.' Scott.

l. 11. Bernardo Tasso, father of Torquato, wrote an epic poem on Amadis of Gaul (Amadigi), with a continuation (Floridante); he is frequently spoken of in his son's Discorsi. The pathetic story how he sacrificed his fame as a learned poet to save his honour as a courtier is told by Torquato Tasso in his Apologia, 1585; it is not irrelevant in the history of the dramatic and narrative Unities: 'Know, therefore, that my father being at the Court of Spain in the service of his master, the Prince of Salerno, was persuaded by the great ones of that Court to make a poem of the fabulous story of Amadis; which in the judgement of many, and mine particularly, is the most beautiful of all that kind, and perhaps the most wholesome; because in sentiment and conduct it surpasses all, and in variety of incidents it yields to none, before or since composed. Having then accepted this advice, and being one who most completely understood the Art of Poetry, and especially that of Aristotle, he resolved to make a poem of one action, and framed his fable on the desperation of Amadis for the jealousy of Oriana, ending with the battle between Lisuarte and Cildadan, and many of the other more important things, befallen before or thereafter succeeding, he narrated in episodes or in digressions, as we call them. This was the design, which no master of the art could have made better or fairer. But in the end, not to lose the name of good courtier, he forbore to keep by force that of loftiest poet; and you shall hear in what manner.

'He was reading some books of the poem to the Prince, his master; and when he began to read, the rooms were full of gentlemen listening; but at last they were all withdrawn; from which thing he took argument that the Unity of Action was in itself little delightful, and not through want of art in himself; inasmuch as he had treated it in point of art beyond censure; and in this he was no whit deceived. But perhaps he would have been content with that which contented Antimachus of Colophon, to whom Plato was of more account than a multitude, if the Prince had not added his command to the general persuasion; wherefore he was bound to obey,

"But with heart grieving and a darken'd brow";

because he knew that with the unity of the fable his poem lost much of its perfection' (Prose di Torquato Tasso, ed. Guasti, Firenze, 1875, i. p. 319).

1. 28. God-smith. The word is used in a different sense in Absalom and Achitophel:

'Gods they had tried of every shape and size
That godsmiths could produce, or priests devise.'

1. 29. no warluck. Scottish superstitions were being studied about this time by Pepys and others; compare Prior, Alma:

'The commentators on old Aristotle ('tis urg'd) in judgment vary;
They to their own conceits have brought
The image of his general thought,
Just as the melancholic eye
Sees fleets and armies in the sky;
And to the poor apprentice ear
The bells sound "Whittington, Lord Mayor."

The conjurer thus explains his scheme,
 Thus spirits walk, and prophets dream;
 North-Britons thus have second-sight;
 And Germans, free from gun-shot, fight.'

P. 184, l. 12. a kind of St. Swithin hero. Cf. Perrault, Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes en ce qui regarde la Poésie, 1692 (this is the third volume of the series of four, completed in 1696), p. 135 (L'Abbé loquitur): 'Cependant puisque Virgile y a trouvé son compte, je veux bien qu'il l'appelle Père tant qu'il luy plaira; mais je ne puis souffrir qu'il le fasse pleurer à tout moment. Il pleure en voyant les tableaux qui représentent les aventures du siège de Troye; non seulement en jettant quelques pleurs, comme le pouvoit permettre l'amour tendre de la patrie, mais en se noyant le visage d'un fleuve de larmes, et en pleurant à trois reprises sur le mesme sujet, ce qui ne convient point à une douleur de cette nature. Il pleure en quittant Aceste, en perdant Palinure, en voyant Didon dans les enfers, où cette tendresse excessive ne sied point à un Heros. Mais ce qui est absolument insupportable, c'est la crainte qui le saisit en tous rencontres. Il tremble de peur, et ses membres sont glacez de froid, en voyant une tempeste. La peur le penetre jusques dans la moëlle des os, lorsqu'il voit les Dieux qu'il avoit apportez de Troye qui luy parlent la nuit. La mesme peur luy court encore dans les os, en arrachant les branches dont il dégouta du sang. Cette manière de trembler en toutes sortes d'occasions ne me semble point héroïque, ny convenir au fondateur de l'Empire Romain et au Père de tous les Césars.'

l. 13. One of these censors. Dryden was thinking (with grief) of St. Évremond, Réflexions sur nos Traducteurs, 1673: 'Vous remarquerez encore que toutes ces lamentations commencent presque aussitôt que la tempête. Les vents soufflent impétueusement, l'air s'obscurcit; il tonne, il éclaire, les vagues deviennent grosses et furieuses; voilà ce qui arrive dans tous les orages. Il n'y a jusque-là ni mât qui se rompe, ni voiles qui se déchirent, ni rames brisées, ni gouvernail perdu, ni ouverture par où l'eau puisse entrer dans le navire; et c'était là du moins qu'il fallait attendre à se désoler: car il y a mille jeunes gens en Angleterre, et autant de femmes en Hollande, qui s'étonnent à peine où le héros témoigne son désespoir.'

l. 30. Mr. Moyle; see p. 138, and note.

P. 186, l. 10. Sir Robert Howard. The old quarrel of 1668 seems to have been appeased by this time.

P. 187, l. 32. Dr. Cudworth (1617-1688). Author of the True Intellectual System of the Universe, 1678. See Dr. Tulloch's Rational Theology in England.

P. 189, l. 14. his two translators. See below, note on p. 220, l. 20.

P. 190, l. 8. presented; i. e. gave him a present.

P. 191, l. 14. Dares Phrygius. Read Dictys Cretensis, iii. p. 15.

l. 15. slain cowardly; i.e. in a cowardly manner by Achilles; Dictys tells how Hector, with a small company of retainers, was caught in an ambush at the ford, when going to meet Penthesilea.

l. 18. Rinaldo. The objection that Rinaldo was not historical was made in Tasso's lifetime, and answered by him in a letter of February, 1585: 'Di Reginaldo si fa nell' istoria menzione.'

P. 192, l. 30. Sir Henry Wotton: 'An ambassador is an honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country.' See his Life by Izaak Walton.

P. 193, l. 1. One who imitates Boccacini. Trajano Boccalini (1556-1613) began the publication of his Ragguagli di Parnasso, News of Parnassus, in 1612, at Venice; the book was translated into English by Henry Cary, Earl of Monmouth, in 1656 (Advertisements from Parnassus in two Centuries, with the Politick Touchstone . . .). It has left some traces in English Literature, e.g. in the story of the critic presented with the chaff for his pains in sifting (Spectator, No. 291), and in the more famous case of the Laconian sentenced to read the History of Guicciardini. See Mestica, Trajano Boccalini e la letteratura critica e politica del seicento, 1878. There were many imitators of Boccalini, but for this one it is perhaps unnecessary to make researches.

P. 194, l. 24. splendid miracles. Speciosa miracula. Hor., A. P. 144.

l. 32. Tasso, in one of his Discourses; i.e. in the second, Dell' Arte Poetica, 1587: 'Ma sì come in Didone confuse di tanto spazio l' ordine de' tempi, per aver occasione di mescolare fra la severità dell' altre materie i piacevolissimi ragionamenti d' amore, e per assegnare un' alta ed ereditaria cagione della inimicizia fra Romani e Cartaginesi,' &c.

P. 195, l. 26. Nec pars ulla magis. Trist. ii. 535.

P. 197, l. 26. so strange. 'Mr. Malone here reads so strong; but strange here seems to signify alarming, or startling.'—SCOTT.

P. 198, l. 15. Quid prohibetis. Ovid, Metam. vi. 349.

l. 22. Odysseis. The form is common, sometimes with mark of diæresis, Odysseis (Dennis, Letters, 1695, p. 138); as a singular noun it goes along with Iliad here; so also in Spenser's Letter, quoted above in the note to p. 178. The spelling Odysseis is also found, which sometimes seems to be plural (the Odysseys), going along with the Iliads. So Hobbes, 'the Iliads and Odysseys of Homer,' 1676. Sometimes, however, it is singular, as in Pope's Essay on Homer (1715), p. 32, 'while the Iliad and Odysseys remain.'

P. 199, l. 26. There is a kind of invention in the imitation of Raphael.

Compare p. 200, l. 5: 'for the draughts of both were taken from the ideas they had of Nature.' This is a repetition of the views already expounded in the Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

P. 202, l. 1. Another French critic, whom I will not name. St. Évremond again, Sur les Poèmes des Anciens, 1685: 'Quelquefois les comparaisons nous tirent des objets qui nous occupent le plus, par la vaine image d'un autre objet, qui fait mal à propos une diversion.' Perrault is more emphatic on the subject of long-tailed similes: see the Spectator, No. 303. But Dryden had not the same reason for showing respect to Perrault. In the Character of M. St. Évremond Dryden had already made his complaint openly: 'It is true that as I am a religious admirer of Virgil I could wish that he had not discovered our father's nakedness'; he had also made more concessions to the adversary with regard to Aeneas than he was ready to confirm in 1697.

l. 13. similitudes . . . are not for tragedy. See vol. i. p. 223, l. 31, and note. Similes are, however, kept by Addison in his Cato, at the end of almost every Act, and 'So have I seen' remained a formula at any rate till Fielding's Tragedy of Tragedies.

l. 28. Perhaps meaning the allegory in Aen. iv. 175-188.

P. 204, l. 4. Pontanus. His edition of Virgil in fol., Augsburg, 1599.

l. 9. Junius and Tremellius. 'Commentators on the Scripture, mentioned by our author in the Religio Laici, where, speaking of Dickenson's translation of Père Simon's Critical History of the Old Testament, he calls it—

"A treasure which if country curates buy,
They Junius and Tremellius may defy." SCOTT.

Emanuel Tremellius, 1510-1580, a converted Jew of Ferrara, turned Protestant and became Professor of Hebrew at Sedan. Franciscus Junius (or Du Jon), 1545-1602, was associated with Tremellius in a Latin translation of the Bible; he was the father of Francis Junius, the philologist, and grandfather of Isaac Vossius.

l. 35. Ronsard. Préface sur la Franciade. 'Le poème héroïque, qui est tout guerrier, comprend seulement les actions d'une année entière, et semble que Virgile y ait failli, selon que luy-mesme l'escrit:

"Annuus exactis completur mensibus orbis
Ex quo reliquias divinique ossa parentis Condidimus terra."

Il y avoit desja un an passé quand il fit les jeux funèbres de son père en Sicile, et toutefois il n'aborda de long temps après en Italie.'

· P. 208, l. 22. these cant words. Compare Ben Jonson's dissertation on the natural history of Cant (i.e. slang) in the Staple of News, and the Essay of Victor Hugo on the same subject in Les Misérables.

P. 210, l. 5. guardian angels. Compare the Preface to Juvenal, p. 34, and notes; and Fables, p. 272.

l. 13. which Tasso has not ill copied. Gerusalemme Liberata, xviii. st. 92-97, where St. Michael shows Godfrey the heavenly host:

‘But higher lift thy happy eyes, and view
Where all the sacred hosts of Heaven appear,
He look’d and saw where winged armies flew,
Innumerable, pure, divine, and clear;
A battle round of squadrons three they show,
And all by threes these squadrons ranged were,
Which spreading wide in rings still wider go:
Mov’d with a stone, calm water circled so.’

FAIRFAX (st. 96).

P. 213, l. 24. non me tua turbida. Inaccurately quoted for ‘Non me tua fervida terrent Dicta ferrox.’ Aen. xii. 895.

P. 214, l. 35. ornari res ipsa negat. Manilius, iii. 39 (Malone’s reference).

P. 215, l. 17. Casura. Here used for elision of vowels; synalepha in Third Miscellany.

P. 217, l. 14. nobis non licet esse tam disertis. Again. See p. 103, l. 9.

l. 25. Dic, quibus in terris; Eclogue 3, 106.

l. 31. Though deep, yet clear, &c. This couplet was no longer left unnoticed, after Dryden’s quotation of it. It had even to be put in the Index of things too often repeated:

‘If Anna’s happy reign you praise,
Pray not a word of halcyon days:
Nor let my votaries show their skill
In aping lines from Cooper’s Hill;
For know, I cannot bear to hear,
The mimicry of deep, yet clear.’

Swift, Apollo’s Edict, 1720.

This poem of Swift’s, by the way, is another proof of the influence of Boccacini; it is ‘occasioned by News from Parnassus.’

P. 218, l. 25. Formerly the French . . . had but five feet. Dryden probably judged hastily, from the decasyllabic verse of the Franciade, that the Alexandrine was not of long standing in French poetry:

‘Charles, mon Prince, enflez-moy le courage;
En vostre honneur j’entreprend cet ouvrage;
Soyez mon guide et gardez d’abysmer
Ma nef, qui flotte en si profonde mer.’

P. 219, l. 6. The turn on thoughts and words. Above, p. 108, l. 17.

l. 23. The want of genius. ‘Although the ordinary genius of the French appears indifferent enough, it is certain that those who distinguish themselves amongst us, are capable of producing the finest things; &c. (Some Observations upon the Taste and Judgment of the French, in the volume of St. Évremond's Miscellaneous Essays, for which Dryden wrote the Introduction, 1692; Œuvres, iv. p. 205.) Compare also another passage of St. Évremond about the want of depth in French imaginative work: 'En effet nous nous contentons des premières images que nous donnent les objets; et pour nous arrêter aux simples dehors, l'apparent presque toujours nous tient lieu du vrai et le facile du naturel' (St. Évremond, De la Comédie anglaise, 1677: see vol. i. p. xv.).

P. 220, l. 7. Non fû si santo, &c. Orlando Furioso xxxv. st. 26, from the discourse of St. John the Evangelist to Astolpho in the Heaven of the Moon.

l. 20. the two brothers. 'Robert et Antoine le Chevalier d'Agneaux, frères, de Vire en Normandie,' 1582: new edition, 1607, with sonnets by Vauquelin de la Fresnaye: already referred to, p. 189, l. 19.

l. 21. Hannibal Caro. See above, vol. i. p. 256, l. 19, and vol. ii. p. 29, l. 34.

l. 25. Le Clerc. Jean Le Clerc (1657-1736) in Bibliothèque Universelle et Historique, t. ix. p. 219 (de l'Année 1688): Essai de Critique, où l'on tâche de montrer en quoi consiste la Poésie des Hébreux.

l. 27. arrant. Common in the sense of genuine, thorough-going.

P. 221, l. 7. the white; the middle of the target.

l. 10. Doctor Morelli. 'Dr. Henry Morelli, one of the College of Physicians in our author's time; whose name appears among the Subscribers to the scheme for a publick Dispensary in 1696.' Malone.

l. 22. Sorti Pater æquis utrique. Aen. x. 450: "My father will be able to bear either extreme of fortune"; an answer to Turnus' speech, v. 443' (Cuperem ipse parens spectator adesset). Conington.

P. 222, l. 3. Sic ait; ibid. v. 473. Conington refers to Dryden here, and disapproves of Ruæus. Waller translated Aen. iv. 437-583.

l. 26. Sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley. Denham did the Second Book (The Destruction of Troy, an Essay on the Second Book of Virgil's Æneis, 1636); also a free version of the Passion of Dido. Cowley, the Second Georgic from v. 458.

P. 223, l. 10. in a former dissertation; i.e. in the Parallel of Poetry and Painting, p. 147.

l. 30. These are mob readers. 'Mob' was not yet quite established in 1692; 'mob, as they call them,' Preface to Cleomenes. Two years before in Don Sebastian it is the mobile (Act i. sc. 1; Act iii. sc. 3).

'Tis a laudable commotion; the voice of the mobile is the voice of Heaven').

P. 224, l. 12. like the Mançanares. From Bouhours' Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène: II. La Langue Française. 'Pour moy je n'entends jamais ces mots et ces expressions de la langue Castillane, que je ne me souviene du Mançanares. On diroit à entendre ce grand mot que la rivière de Madrid est le plus grand fleuve du monde: et cependant ce n'est qu'un petit ruisseau, qui est le plus souvent à sec; et qui, si nous en croyons un Poëte Castillan, ne mérite pas d'avoir un pont. Je me souviens des vers Espagnols, et vous ne serez peut-être pas fâché de les apprendre en passant:

"Duelete dessa puente Mançanares

Mira que dize por ai la gente,

Que no eres-río para media puente

Y que ella es puente para treinta mares."

LUIS DE GONGORA.

Voilà ce que c'est que le Mançanares, et voilà aussi à peu près ce que c'est que la langue Castillane.'

l. 22. Owen's Epigrams. See above, note on p. 27, l. 25.

l. 25. a bladdered greatness. See vol. i. p. 247, l. 11: 'swelling puffy style.'

P. 225, l. 3. as a wit said formerly. Lord Rochester; see p. 258.

l. 24. imagination only. Imagination has been degraded in meaning since Dryden explained its functions in the account of Annus Mirabilis; what here is called Imagination is there called Fancy, or Invention and Fancy.

l. 28. Marini's Adone. Published at Paris in 1623, with a Preface (in French) by Chapelain: L'Adone, poema del Cavalier Marino. The poem has been fully described by Mr. J. A. Symonds in his Renaissance in Italy. Marino was known to English poets, though his influence has been unduly exaggerated. He is seen at his best in Crashaw's version from his poem on the Slaughter of the Innocents. In the Guerre di Parnaso, 1643, by Scipione Herrico, 'one who imitates Boccacini,' Marino is the leader of a revolt against Aristotle and Apollo.

P. 226, l. 11. Dampier. His Voyages came out in this year: A New Voyage round the World. Dampier is speaking of Quito, in the year 1684: 'I know no place where Gold is found but what is very unhealthy.'

l. 28. Mr. Creech. See vol. i. p. 264, l. 19.

P. 227, l. 5. Philarchus, I remember, taxes Balzac. More accurately Phyllarchus i. q. dux foliorum, with an equivoque 'Head of a house of Feuillants': according to the Segraisiana, Balzac's sagacity at once discerned in this name the Feuillant his adversary. See for the whole controversy Emile Roy, De Ioan. Lud. Guezio Balzacio contra Dom. Ioan. Gulonium disputante, 1892. Phyllarchus was Jean Goulou de St. François; his criticism of Balzac's style appeared in 1627, Lettres de Phyllarque à Ariste où il est traité de l'éloquence françoise; a second Part in 1628. Balzac in these Letters is Narcisse. Dryden refers to a passage in Letter xxi: 'Le mesme Quintilian enseigne que la suite de plusieurs monosyllabes est vicieuse, d'autant qu'elle fait sauteller le discours entrecoupé de petites particules et le rend comme raboteux: et que partant il faut esviter la continuation des petits mots comme aussi par raison contraire on doit fuir l'entresuite des parolles qui sont longues, à cause qu'elles apportent une pesanteur des-agréable à la prononciation. Voyons si Narcisse n'a point encores péché contre cette reigle. Il parle de la sorte en la mesme Lettre [en la Lettre 20 du 4 livre]. Qui est-ce qui peut dire cela de soy? Où sont ceux qui se sont tenus fermes, &c.? Ariste, tu peux remarquer la suite de quinze petits mots dont les treize sont monosyllabes; ce qui montre ou qu'il est ignorant des préceptes de la Rhétorique, ou qu'il y a des reigles qui sont particulières à luy, et incognues à tous les Orateurs.'

P. 229, l. 1. a Pindaric; i. e. an Alexandrine.

l. 5. Chapman has followed him. Triplets in Chapman's Odyssey, e.g. i. 399, iv. 27, v. 361, vi. 351.

l. 7. Mr. Cowley. Cf. Johnson's Life of Cowley: 'Cowley was, I believe, the first poet that mingled Alexandrines at pleasure with the common heroick of ten syllables, and from him Dryden borrowed the practice whether ornamental or licentious.' 'Of triplets in his Davideis he makes no use, and perhaps did not at first think them allowable; but he appears afterwards to have changed his mind, for in the verses on the government of Cromwell he inserts them liberally with great happiness.'

P. 230, l. 10. Staff, i. e. stave, stanza. See note in vol. i. on p. 12, l. 35: Davenant's views in the Preface to Gondibert.

P. 231, l. 19. the excuse of Boccace. In the Epilogue to the Decameron (Conclusion dell' autore): 'che maestro alcun non si trouva da Dio in fuori, che ogni cosa faccia bene e compiutamente. E Carlo Magno che fu il primo facitore de' paladini non ne seppe tanti creare, che esso di lor soli potesse fare hoste.'

P. 232, l. 14. hammered money, for want of milled. Compare Letter xvii. in Scott's Dryden (to Tonson; Feb. 1696?) on the difficulties about the currency: 'I shall lose enough by your bill upon Mr. Knight; for after having taken it all in silver, and not in half-crowns neither, but shillings and sixpences, none of the money will go; for which reason I have sent it all back again, and as the less loss will receive it in guineys at 29 shillings each.' And again

May 26 (Letter xviii), 'Sir Ro. Howard writt me word, that if I cou'd make any advantage by being paid in clipp'd money, he woud change it in the Exchequer.' See Macaulay, History of England, c. xxi. 1, where Dryden's phrase is quoted from this Essay.

P. 233, l. 8. for Cupid read Ascanius :

'Lull'd in her Lap, amidst a Train of Loves
She gently bears him to her blissful Groves :
Then with a wreath of Myrtle crouns his Head,
And softly lays him in a flow'ry Bed.'

l. 21. quisquis studet. Hor. Od. iv.

l. 22. Aude hospes. Aen. viii. 364.

P. 235, l. 6. The late Earl of Lauderdale. Richard Maitland (1653-1695), fourth Earl, sent over his translation from Paris, where he was living doubly exiled, outlawed in England, and not received at St. Germain's by reason of his opposition to the extreme Catholic policy of King James. His work was published in 1737.

l. 30. Two other worthy friends of mine. Dr. Knightwood Chetwood and Mr. Addison. Dr. Chetwood wrote the Life of Virgil, and the Preface to the Pastorals; see Dryden's letter to Tonson, No. xxvi. in Scott's edition: 'I have also this day written to Mr. Chetwood, and let him know that the book is immediately going to the press again. My opinion is that the printer shou'd begin with the first Pastoral, and print on to the end of the Georgiques, or farther if occasion be, till Dr. Chetwood corrects his Preface, which he writes me word is printed very false.' Addison wrote the Preface to the Georgics.

P. 236, l. 12. why I writ not always in the proper terms. See Introduction to Annus Mirabilis, and compare Warton on Dante, History of English Poetry, cxlix: 'We are surprised that a poet should write one hundred cantos on Hell, Paradise, and Purgatory. But this prolixity is partly owing to the want of art and method; and is common to all early compositions, in which everything is related circumstantially and without rejection, and not in those general terms which are used by modern writers.'

l. 23. the four preliminary lines :

'Ille ego qui quondam gracili modulatus avena
Carmen et egressus silvis vicina coegi
Ut quamvis avido parerent arva colono Gratum opus agricolis at nunc horrentia Martis.'

l. 19. Tucca and Varius. The story being that these editors 'retrenched' the four opening lines, leaving Arma virumque at the head of the first book.

P. 238, l. 28. A Sixth Pastoral (Silenus), translated by Lord Roscommon; Pharmaceutria (the Eighth Pastoral).

P. 238, l. 29. Orpheus, 'being a Translation out of the Fourth Book of Virgil's Georgic' by Lord Mulgrave, referred to already, p. 222.

P. 239, l. 3. Erichthonius. Virgil, Georg. iii. 113:

'Primus Erichthonius currus et quattuor ausus Iungere equos, rapidusque rotis insistere victor.'

l. 20. your noble kinsman the Earl of Dorset. 'Their mothers' were half-sisters, being both daughters of Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Middlesex.' SCOTT.

POSTSCRIPT TO THE ÆNEIS.

P. 242, l. 25. The present Earl of Peterborough. The friend of Pope and Swift, the hero of the war of the Spanish succession, 'Mordanto.'

l. 34. Sir William Trumball; to whom Pope's first Pastoral is dedicated; died 1716.

P. 243, l. 15. Fabrini: printed at Venice, 1623.

l. 18. Sir William Bowyer. Mentioned in a note on the Second Georgic: 'Nature has conspired with Art to make the garden at Denham Court of Sir William's own plantation one of the most delicious spots of ground in England; it contains not above five acres (just the compass of Alcinous's garden, described in the Odysses),' &c.

l. 27. Earl of Exeter. John Cecil, fifth Earl, a Nonjuror. The village of Dryden's birth is Aldwinkle in Northamptonshire.

P. 244, l. 1. William Walsh. See Pope's note on his First Pastoral, where this remark of Dryden's is quoted; and the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

l. 20. part of the Third Georgic. Mr. Malone conjectures the concealed translator may have been Lord Lansdowne, author of the poem which precedes that translation in the Miscellanies. SCOTT.

l. 27. After his Bees. Alluding to a translation of the Third Book of the Georgics, exclusive of the story of Aristæus, which appeared in the third volume of the Miscellanies; by the famous Addison, then of Queen's College, Oxford. SCOTT.

l. 32. Dr. Guibbons. The same of whom Dryden elsewhere says:
'Guibbons but guesses, nor is sure to save.' SCOTT.

l. 32. Dr. Hobbs. Also an eminent physician of the time, ridiculed, in the Dispensary, under the title of Guaiacum. SCOTT.

l. 35. The only one of them. Blackmore.

PREFACE TO FABLES (1700).

P. 246, l. 10. a certain nobleman. The Duke of Buckingham.

l. 18. the speeches of Ajax and Ulysses. See i. p. 223.

l. 19. balk. Cf. Dedication of the Georgics, 'if I balked this opportunity.'

l. 20. Fifteenth Book. 'Of the Pythagorean Philosophy.'

P. 247, l. 4. the Hunting of the Boar. Meleager and Atalanta from the Eighth Book.

l. 5. Cinyras and Myrrha, from the Tenth; Baucis and Philemon from the Eighth.

l. 11. Sandys. See above.

l. 20. Spenser more than once insinuates that the soul of Chaucer was transfused into his body. Faery Queene, iv. 2, 34:

'Then pardon O most sacred happie spirit!
That I thy labours lost may thus revive,
And steale from thee the meede of thy due merit,
That none durst ever whilest thou wast alive,
And being dead in vaine yet many strive:
Ne dare I like; but through infusion sweete
Of thine own spirit which doth in me survive,
I follow here the footing of thy feete,
That with thy meaning so I may the rather meete.'

ll. 26-28. Fairfax's Tasso was published in 1600. •Godfrey of Bulloigne, or the Recovery of Jerusalem. One of the stanzas is quoted above in a note on p. 210, l. 13.

P. 248, l. 23. octave rhyme. The stanza was used, in French, by Thibaut, King of Navarre, in the previous century, and before Boccaccio, in Italian, by the author of the Cantare di Fiorio e Bianciflore. But Boccaccio was the first author to give the octave its rank as the Italian 'measure for heroic verse' (p. 107).

P. 249, l. 2. our learned • Mr. Rymer. From the severity of the Third Miscellany (1693), Dryden had returned to his more gentle opinion of Rymer, 'an excellent critic' as he is called in the Vindication of the Duke of Guise (1683).

l. 3. from the Provençal. See Rymer on the 'Provincial Poetry' in his Short View of Tragedy. 'This Provincial was the first of the modern languages that yielded and chim'd in with the musick and sweetness of ryme; which making its way by Savoy to Monferat, the Italians thence began to file their volgare, and to set their verses all after the Chimes of Provence. Our Intermarriages and our Dominions thereabouts brought us much sooner acquainted with their Tongue and Poetry; and they with us that would write verse, as King Richard, Savery de Mauleon, and Rob. Grostead, finding the English stubborn and unwieldy fell readily to that of Provence, as more glib, and lighter on the Tongue. But they who attempted verse in English, down till Chaucer's time, made an heavy pudder, and are always miserably put to 't for a word to clink; which commonly fall so awkward and unexpectedly as dropping from the Clouds by some Machine or Miracle. Chaucer found an Herculean labour on his hands; and did perform to Admiration. He seizes all Provençal, French, and Latin that came in his way, gives them a new garb and livery, and mingles them amongst our English: turns out English, gowty or superannuated, to place in their room the foreigners fit for service, train'd and accustomed to Poetical Discipline. But though the Italian reformation was begun and finished well nigh at the same time by Boccace, Dante, and Petrarch, our language retain'd something of the churl; something of the Stiff and Gothish did stick upon it, till long after Chaucer. Chaucer threw in Latin, French, Provençal, and other Languages, like new Stum to raise a Fermentation; in Queen Elizabeth's time it grew fine, but came not to an Head and Spirit, did not shine and sparkle till Mr. Waller set it a running.' This is the passage of literary history summed up in Rymer's table of contents in the following remarkable terms: 'Chaucer refin'd our English. Which in perfection by Waller.' Rymer knew something about Provençal poetry, and something about Chaucer, and through Dryden and Pope has made it a matter of traditional belief that Chaucer belongs, in some way or other, to 'the Provençal School.' Dryden seems not to have distinguished between Provençal and old French.

P. 249, l. 31. the other harmony of prose; a reminiscence of Aristotle, Poet. c. iv. τῆς λεκτικῆς ἁρμονίας.

P. 250, l. 19. dead-colouring. See vol. i p. 109, l. 7.

l. 26. staved; like contraband hogsheads.

P. 251, l. 9. a religious lawyer. Jeremy Collier.

P. 252, l. 24. Mr. Hobbes. 'The Iliads and Odysseys of Homer. Translated out of Greek into English by Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, with a large Preface concerning the Virtues of an Heroic Poem written by the Translator,' 1676.

l. 31. now the words are the colouring. See p. 147, and p. 223.

P. 253, l. 14. Choleric, &c. Dryden had before him the locus classicus on humours, in the Nun's Priest's Tale (the Cock and the Fox).

l. 34. Longinus, c. 12 καὶ ὁ μὲν ἡμέτερος διὰ τὸ μετὰ βίας ἕκαστα ἐτι δὲ τάχους βώμης δεινότητος ὅλον καλεῖν τε ἅμα καὶ διαρπάξεν σκηπτῷ τινι παρεικάζουσι' ἂν ἡ κεραυνῷ, ὁ δὲ Κικέρων ὡς ἀμφιλαφῆς τις ἐμπρησμός οἶμαι πάντῃ νέμεται καὶ ἀνειλεῖται, κ.τ.λ.

P. 254, l. 6. the violent playing of a new machine. Dryden's memory had misplaced the Dream of Agamemnon, which in the Second Book comes before the Catalogue of the Ships.

l. 26. philology. Includes all studies connected with literature.

P. 255, l. 5. the invention of Petrarch. What Petrarch sent to Boccaccio was a Latin version of Boccaccio's story of Griselda in the Decameron, accompanied by a letter: there is an English translation of the letter in Robinson and Rolfe's Essay on Petrarch, 1898. Petrarch made his translation in the year 1373.

1. 8. by a Lombard author. See Troilus and Cressida above, p. 213, l. 14.

P. 256, l. 32. John Littlewit: at the beginning of Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair; not quite as in Dryden's quotation: 'A pretty conceit and worth the finding! I have such luck to spin out such fine things still, and like a silk-worm, out of myself.'

P. 257, l. 17 the turn of words. See p. 108, l. 17, and note.

P. 258, l. 5. one of our late great poets. Cowley; see above, p. 108, and compare the judgement of the Battle of the Books on Cowley: '— one half lay panting on the ground to be trod in pieces by the horses feet; the other half was borne by the frighted steed through the field. This Venus took, washed it seven times in ambrosia, then struck it thrice with a sprig of amarant; upon which the leather grew round and soft, and the leaves turned into feathers, and being gilded before, continued gilded still; so it became a dove, and she harnessed it to her chariot.' Compare Dryden's reference in the Dedication of Aurengzebe: '— his master Epicurus and my better master Cowley.'

1. 27. for Catullus read Martial:

'Occurrit tibi nemo quod libenter

Quod quocunque venis, fuga est et ingens

Circa te Ligurine solitudo:

Quid sit scire cupis: nimis poeta es.' iii. 44.

1. 30. auribus istius temporis accommodata: 'auribus iudicum accommodata.' Tac. Orat. c. 21.

P. 259, l. 2. he who published the last edition of him. 'Thomas Speght's edition of Chaucer was published in 1597 and 1602. The Preface contains the passage which Dryden alludes to: "And for his (Chaucer's) verses, although, in divers places, they seem to us to stand of unequal measures, yet a skilful reader, who can scan them in their nature, shall find it otherwise. And if a verse, here and there, fall out a syllable shorter or longer than another, I rather ascribe it to the negligence and rape of Adam Scrivener (that I may speake as Chaucer doth), than to any unconning or oversight in the author: for how fearful he was to have his works miswritten, or his vearse mismeasured, may appeare in the end of his fift booke of Troilus and Creseide, where he writeth thus:

'And for there is so great diversitie

In English, and in writing of our tongue,

So pray I God that none miswrite thee,

Ne thee mismetre for default of tongue.'

By his hasty and inconsiderate contradiction of honest Speght's panegyric, Dryden has exposed himself to be censured for pronouncing rashly upon a subject with which he was but imperfectly acquainted. The learned Tyrwhitt has supported Speght's position, with equal pains and success, and plainly proves that the apparent inequalities of the rhyme of Chaucer arise chiefly from the change in pronunciation since his time, particularly from a number of words being now pronounced as one syllable, which in those days were prolonged into two, or as two syllables, which were anciently three. These researches, in the words of Ellis, "have proved what Dryden denied, viz., that Chaucer's versification, wherever his genuine text is preserved, was uniformly correct, although the harmony of his lines was, in many cases, been obliterated by the changes that have taken place in the mode of accenting our language." Specimens of the Early English Poets, vol. i. p. 209. Scott.

P. 259, l. 20. a Harrington. Sir John Harrington's Orlando Furioso in English Heroical Verse appeared in 1591.

P. 260, l. 12. the tale of Piers Plowman, i.e. the Ploughman's Tale, printed at the end of the Canterbury Tales; written by the author of the Ploughman's Creed. See Skeat, Chaucerian and other Pieces; Supplement to the Works of Geoffrey Chaucer.

P. 261, l. 21. Dr. Drake. James Drake wrote an answer to Collier. The Ancient and Modern Stages Reviewed, or Mr. Collier's View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the Stage set in a True Light, 1699.

l. 27. prior laesit. Terence, Eunuchus prol. 4:

'Tum siquis est qui dictum in se inclementius

Existumabit esse, sic existumet

Responsum non dictum esse quia laesit prior.'

P. 261, l. 15. Baptista Porta; the famous Italian physiognomist.

P. 263, l. 16. Wife of Bath, in the Prologue to her Tale; modernized by Pope.

P. 264, l. 34. The late Earl of Leicester. Philip, third Earl, to whom Don Sebastian is dedicated; brother of Algernon Sidney. He died in 1697.

P. 267, l. 17. some old Saxon friends. The study of early English and the cognate dialects was making great progress at this time, through the industry of Dr. Hickes, Mr. Thomas Hearne, and other scholars; Dryden was probably thinking particularly of Rymer.

l. 30. their grandam gold. Compare The Wild Gallant, iv. 1: 'now I think on't, Frances has one hundred and twenty pieces of old grandam-and-aunt gold left her, that she would never let me touch.'

P. 268, l. 13. into the old Provençal: as before, Dryden does not distinguish Provençal from old French.

P. 269, ll. 25-33. Dryden did not know Boccaccio's Teseide, the immediate original of the Knight's Tale.

P. 270, l. 33. M — : Milbourne.

l. 33. B — : 'the City Bard or Knight Physician,' Sir Richard Blackmore.

P. 272, l. 5. his Arthurs: Prince Arthur and King Arthur. Blackmore's Epics, published in 1695 and 1697.

l. 8. the Guardian Angels of Kingdoms. See Preface to Juvenal, p. 34.

l. 11. the whirl-bats of Eryx. Aen. v. 400.

l. 17. Mr. Collier. Jeremy Collier, 1650-1726, a non juring clergyman, wrote, besides his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the Stage, 1698, an Historical Dictionary, 1701-1721, from which a remark on Shakespeare is quoted by Mr. Browning: "His genius was jocular but, when disposed, he could be very serious." Collier had found fault with Dryden's want of religion: 'The Author of Don Sebastian strikes at the Bishops through the sides of the Mufti, and borrows the Name of the Turk to make the Christians ridiculous.' 'In Cleomenes Cassandra rails against Religion at the Altar, and in the midst of a publick Solemnity:

"Accurs'd be thou, Grass-eating fodder'd God!

Accurs'd thy Temple, more accurs'd thy Priests!"

P. 273, l. 24. the battle of Senneph (Senef), Aug. 11, 1674, when Condé fell on the rear-guard of the Prince of Orange, then retreating between Charleroi and Mons. The battle had been described by Sir William Temple in his Memoirs of what passed in Christendom from 1672 to 1679.

APPENDIX A

A SHORT HISTORY OF CRITICISM FROM THE TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE TO MIXT ESSAYS WRITTEN ORIGINALLY IN FRENCH BY THE SIEUR DE SAINT EVREMONT, 1685.

AFTER the Italians the French took fire, and began to sublime and purifie themselves upon the rising of that glorious Minister Cardinal Richlieu, who founded the Royal Academy, and having muster'd the best Wits together, employ'd them in reforming the Stage, the Language, and Manners of his Country. L'Abbé Hedelin undertook the Theater, of which he published the most perfect Treatise yet extant; and if the Cardinal had liv'd some years longer, he would have carried it much higher, and even contended with Athens, and Rome themselves. Malherbe, Corneille, Chapelain, Moliere, Boileau, Fontaine, and Rapin, have cultivated, and exalted the Subject. The Learned Chanoine of St. Geneviève R. P. le Bossu, hath given us the best Idea, and most exact Model of Epick Poem. The Dutch and Germans (as though frozen up) have produced little in this kind; yet we must confess that Grotius, Heinsius, Scaliger and Vossius were Learned Criticks.
Some of the English have indeed rais'd their Pens, and soar'd as high as any of the Italians, or French; yet Criticism came but very lately in fashion amongst us; without doubt Ben Johnson had a large stock of Critical Learning; Spencer had studied Homer, and Virgil, and Tasso, yet he was misled, and debauched by Ariosto, as Mr. Rymer judiciously observes; Davenant gives some stroaks of great Learning and Judgment, yet he is for unbeaten Tracks, new Ways, and undiscover'd Seas; Cowley was a great Master of the Antients, and had the true Genius and Character of a Poet;

yet this nicety and boldness of Criticism was a stranger all this time to our Climate; Mr. Rymer and Mr. Dryden have begun to launch out into it, and indeed they have been very fortunate Adventurers. The Earls of R. and M. and Mr. W. have given some fine touches; Mr. Drydens Criticks are generally quaint and solid, his Prefaces doth as often correct and improve my Judgment, as his Verses doth Charm my Fancy; he is every-where Sweet, Elegant, and Sublime; the Poet and Critick were seldom both so Conspicuous and Illustrious in one man as in him, except Rapin. Mr. Rymer in his incomparable Preface to Rapin, and in his Reflections upon some late Tragedies, hath given sufficient proofs that he hath studied and understands Aristotle and Horace, Homer, and Virgil, besides the Wits of all Countries and Ages; so that we may justly number him in the first rank of Criticks, as having a most accomplish'd Idea of Poetry and the Stage.

APPENDIX B

AUTHORITIES, CRITICAL AND HISTORICAL.

BELJAME, Le Public et les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre. 1883.

BLOUNT, De Re Poetica, 1694.

BOSSU, Traité du Poème épique. 1675.

BOUHOURS, Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène. 1671.

BREITINGER, Les Unités d'Aristote avant le Cid de Corneille. 1879.

BUTCHER, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and Fine Art. 1897.

BUTLER, Samuel, The Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose. 1759.

CAMPBELL, Lewis, Greek Tragedy. 1891.

CHAPELAIN, Preface to L'Adone of Marino. 1622.

— Preface to La Pucelle. 1656.

CHAPPUZEAU, Le Théâtre Français. 1674.

COLLINS, J. Churton, Essays and Studies. 1895.

CORNEILLE, Le Théâtre de P. Corneille, 3 volumes, 8°, 1660, containing the three Discourses and the Examens :—

[Vol. i. Discours de l'Utilité et des Parties du Poème dramatique.

Vol. ii. Discours de la Tragedie et des moyens de la traiter selon le vraisemblable ou le nécessaire.

Vol. iii. Discours des trois Unités d'Action, de Jour et de Lieu.]

DACIER, Preface sur les Satires d'Horace. 1687.

D'AUBIGNAC (HÉDELIN), La Pratique du Théâtre. 1657.

DAVENANT, Preface to Gondibert. 1651.

DENNIS, Select Works. 1718.

ELTON, O., The Augustan Ages. 1899.

- FOURNEL, Le Théâtre au xvii^e Siècle; La Comédie. 1892.
- GARNETT, R., The Age of Dryden. 1895.
- GOSSE, From Shakespeare to Pope. 1885.
- HAMELIUS, Die Kritik in der Englischen Literatur des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts. 1897.
- JOHNSON, Lives of the Poets. 1779-1781.
- JUSSERAND, Shakespeare en France sous l'Ancien Régime. 1898.
- LA MESNARDIÈRE, La Poétique. 1640.
- LEMAÎTRE, Corneille et la Poétique d'Aristote. 1888.
- MALONE, Critical and Miscellaneous Prose Works of John Dryden. 1800.
- PERRAULT, Parallèle des Anciens et des Modernes. 1688-1696.
- PETIT DE JULLEVILLE, Le Théâtre en France. 1889.
- (edited by), Histoire de la Langue et de la Littérature française. 1896-1900.
- RAPIN, Œuvres diverses du R. P. R. Rapin. Amsterdam, 1686.
- RIGAL, Alexandre Hardy et le Théâtre français à la fin du xvi^e et au commencement du xvii^e Siècle. 1889.
- RYMER, The Tragedies of the Last Age Considered and Examined by the Practice of the Ancients. 1678.
- A Short View of Tragedy. 1693.
- SAINT-ÉVREMOND, Œuvres, ed. Des Maizeaux. 1705.
- SAINTSBURY, Dryden ['English Men of Letters']. 1881.
- SARASIN, Discours de la Tragédie. 1639.
- SCALIGER, J. C., Poetices libri septem. 1561.
- SCOTT, Life of Dryden, in his edition of Dryden's Works. 1808.
- SCUDÉRY, Preface to Ibrahim ou l'illustre Bassa. 1641.
- Preface to Alaric. 1654.
- SETTLE, Notes and Observations on the Empress of Morocco revised. 1674.
- VAUGHAN, C. E., English Literary Criticism. 1896.
- WESELMANN, Dryden als Kritiker. 1893.

INDEX

- Absalom and Achitophel*, ii. 67, 93, 271.
Addison, Mr., ii. 235 n., 244.
Aeschines, ii. 74.
Aeschylus, i. 202, 221.
Alberti, ii. 120.
Ancients and Moderns, the question as disputed in the seventeenth century, Introd. xxiii sqq., lxvi;
i. 34, 36-51; ii. 6 (Perrault), 26.
Andronicus, Livius, ii. 57 sqq.
Apollonius, his Argonauts, i. 180.
Apuleius, ii. 67.
Ariosto, i. 150; ii. 26, 32, 155,
165, 182, 220.
Aristophanes, i. 85; ii. 57, 99.
Aristotle, i. 38, 207, 221; ii. 146, 156, 249 n. Criticism first instituted by, i. 179.
Arthur, King, plan of an epic poem on, ii. 38, 272.
Augustus, his tragedy, i. 3; his epigram, 231; Majestas, ii. 89.
Balzac, Phyllarque on, ii. 227.
Bamboccio, ii. 119.
Barclay, Jean, i. 6 n.; ii. 67.
Peaumont and Fletcher, i. 80, 146;
Philaster, 166; Maid's Tragedy,
205 n., 218.
Bellori, ii. 117 sqq.
Berkenhead, Sir John, i. 122.
Betterton, Mr., i. 204, 279.
Black Friars, theatre, i. 175.
Blackmore, ii. 244 n., 270, 272 n.
Blank Verse, i. 6, 91; ii. 29.
Boccace, ii. 231; Preface to Fables, passim.
Boccalini, ii. 193.
Bochartus, ii. 193.
Boiardo, ii. 165.
Boileau, Introd. xli, lx; i. 181;
ii. 26 ('the admirable'), 32 (on machines), 103 (his Satires), 106 (Le Lutrin).
Bossu, the best of modern critics,
i. 211, 218; ii. 43, 136.
Bowyer, Sir William, ii. 243.
Buckhurst, Lord, Thomas Sackville, author of Gorboduc, i. 6.
— Charles Sackville (Eugenius in the Essay), i. 23 (Earl of Dorset); ii. 2 n., 15 sqq., 239.
Buckingham, Duke of, ii. 246 n.;
see Zimri.
Buffon, on the dignity of general terms, Introd. xxiv.
Burnet, Bp. of Salisbury, ii. 76.
Caesar, Julius, i. 26, 42, 105;
ii. 56.
Camoens, author of the Lusiads,
i. 190.
Caracci, ii. 130.
Caravaggio, ii. 119.

- Caro, Hannibal, i. 256; ii. 29, 220.
 Casaubon, Preface to Juvenal, passim.
 Castiglione, ii. 120.
 Catullus, ii. 110, 129.
 Chapelain, author of La Pucelle, Introd. xxv, xxviii, xxxv; La Pucelle referred to, i. 12; ii. 28, 165.
 Chapman, George, i. 12, 246; ii. 9, 11, 14, 229.
 Charles II, the excellency of his manners, i. 176; death, 280, 281; fair words, ii. 38; on impartiality, 69; puns at the court of, 95.
 Chaucer, i. 203; ii. 241, 247 sqq.; 'followed Nature,' 257, 258.
 Chedreux, i. 195 n.
 Chetwood, Knightly, ii. 235 n.
 Chevalier d'Agneaux, le, the brothers Robert and Antoine, translated Virgil, ii. 189, 220.
 Cicero (Tully), i. 26, 30, 256; ii. 65, 118.
 Claudian, i. 9, 255.
 Cleveland, John, i. 52.
 Clevelandism, i. 31.
 Collier, Mr., ii. 251 n., 272.
 Comedy, 134 sqq.
 Condé, Prince of, ii. 273.
 Congreve, Mr., ii. 12, 235.
 Copernican System, ii. 103 n.
 Corneille, Pierre, Dryden's relation to, Introd. xix sqq.; on Unity of Action, xxxix sqq.; i. 40, 64; ii. 157; of Time, Introd. xliii; of Place (lieu théâtral), xlvii sqq.; i. 37; liaison des scènes, 40; The Liar, 68; Polyeucte, 71; Cinna, 71; Pompey, 71, translated, 24 n.; Andromède, 74; on the Unities, 75; The Cid, 83; his influence on Davenant, 149.
 Corneille, Thomas, i. 68, 76, n., 145.
 Cowley, Mr., i. 35, 139, 154, 184, 186, 188, 237, 239, 263, 267, 272; ii. 19, 108, 218, 222, 229, 244, 258, 264.
 Creech, Thomas, i. 264; ii. 226.
 Crites (Sir Robert Howard), i. 23.
 Cudworth, Dr., ii. 187.
 Dacier. See Preface to Juvenal, passim; ii. 136.
 Dampier, ii. 226.
 Daniel, his Defence of Rhyme, i. 97.
 Dante, i. 274; ii. 169, 248.
 D'Aubignac (Hédelin), Abbé, his Pratique du Théâtre, Introd. xxxvi.
 D'Avenant, Sir William, i. 7; ii. 133; Gondibert, stanza of, i. 12; Siege of Rhodes, 97, 150.
 Demosthenes, i. 256; ii. 74.
 Denham, Sir John, i. 7, 35, 238 sqq.; ii. 108, 217, 222, 259.
 Dennis, ii. 32 n.
 Derby, Earl of, ii. 242.
 Descartes, ii. 16.
 Dolben, Gilbert, Esq., ii. 243.
 Donne, Dr., i. 52; ii. 19, 102.
 Dorset; see Buckhurst.
 Drake, Dr., ii. 261.
 Du Bartas; see Sylvester.
 Du Fresnoy, his poem De Arte Graphica, ii. 115 sqq.
 Edward, the Black Prince, considered as possible subject for an epic poem, ii. 38.
 Ennius, ii. 60, 259.
 Erasmus, ii. 67.
 Eugenius (Lord Buckhurst), i. 28.
 Euripides, i. 48; Iphigenie in

- Aulis*, 205; Hippolytus, 210;
Cyclops, ii. 50.
 Evelyn, Mr., i. 264.
 Exeter, Earl of, ii. 243.
- Fabrini, ii. 243.
 Fairfax, ii. 247, 259.
 Fèvre, Tanneguy le, ii. 166, 201.
 Fleckno, ii. 27.
 Fletcher, John, i. 54, 72, 165, 172, 217, 228; Rollo, 60, 217; King and no King, 65, 212, 220;
Scornful Lady, 66; ii. 142, 147;
Faithful Shepherdess, i. 78, 166, 218; Humorous Lieutenant, 166; Chances, revised by Duke of Buckingham, 174 n.; Valentinian, 218.
 French critics, ii. 178.
- Gorboduc, i. 5.
 Gothic manner, ii. 146.
 Gower, ii. 258.
 Guarini, his Pastor Fido, i. 265,
 273; ii. 103, 147.
 Guibbons, Dr., ii. 244.
 Guido Reni, ii. 120.
 Guise, Duke of, the late, i. 158.
- Hales, John, i. 80.
 Harington, Sir John, ii. 259.
 Hart, Mr., acted Dorante in The Liar, i. 68.
 Haughton, Lord, i. 244.
 Heinsius, i. 143, 235; ii. 44, and passim in the Discourse on Satire, 164.
 Heroic Plays, Introd. lii sqq.; i.
 148 sqq. (Essay, prefixed to The Conquest of Granada), 246.
 Heroic Poem, Introd. xv sqq., xxi;
 i. 150 sqq., 181 sqq.; ii. 26 sqq., 127; the moral (allegory), Introd. lxii; i. 213; 'machines,' Introd. liiii, lvi, lx, lxvii; i. 153, 187, 190; ii. 32 sqq., 190, 209-210, 254, 272; 'the greatest work of human nature,' ii. 43, 154.
 Hippocrates, ii. 134.
 Hobbes, Mr., i. 153, 259; ii. 248;
 his translation of Homer, 252.
 Hobbs, Dr., ii. 244.
 Holyday, Barten, ii. 73, 92, 94, 96, 101, 111 sqq.
 Homer, passim; Dryden's Al-manzor copied from Homer's Achilles, i. 155; moral of the Iliad, 213; ii. 12 sq., 251 sqq.
 Horace, passim; i. 38, 45, 51, 163, 171, 215, 266 sqq.; ii. 47; his Satires, 77 sqq.
 Howard, Sir Robert, Introd. 1; letter to (Preface to Annus Mirabilis), i. 10; Indian Queen, 100; Duke of Lerma, 110;
 'that excellent person,' ii. 186, 232 n.
Hudibras, ii. 105.
- Imagination, Dryden's account of,
 Introd. xxxiv; i. 15.
 Italian Tongue, corruption of, ascribed to false wit of preachers, i. 174 n.
- Johnson, Dr., on Dryden's prose,
 Introd. xxvi.
 Jonson, Ben, i. 69, 81, 114, 138, 160, 237; ii. 17; on the Unity of Action, Introd. xxxix; i. 41;
 imitator of the Ancients, 43;
Sejanus, 60; Catiline, 60, 75,
 157, 167 sqq; Magnetic Lady,
 65; The Fox, 73; Sad Shepherd, 78; The Silent Woman, Examen of, 83 sqq.; Bartholomew Fair, 87; ii. 256; Alchemist, i. 141,

- 275; his faults of language, 167;
and of wit, 173.
Julian, the Emperor, ii. 67.
Junius and Tremellius, ii. 204.
Juvenal, i. 54, 200; Discourse on Satire, passim.
- Ketch, Jack, his wife, ii. 93.
Killigrew, Mr. Charles, ii. 67.
- Laberius, i. 91.
Language: French words and phrases, i. 5, 170; 'an alteration lately made in ours,' 164;
'preposition in the end of the sentence,' 168; no English pros- odia, ii. 110, 217; 'our old Teuton monosyllables,' 234.
Lauderdale, Duke of, i. 120 n.
— Earl of, ii. 234.
Le Clerc, ii. 220.
Lee, Nathaniel, i. 179 n.; ii. 142 n.
Leicester, Earl of, ii. 264, 266.
Lely, Sir Peter, i. 254 n.
Le Moine, Father, his heroic poem of St. Louis, ii. 28, 165.
Lentulus, ii. 127.
Lidgate, ii. 258.
Lisideus (Sir Charles Sedley),
i. 28.
Longinus, after Aristotle the greatest critic amongst the Greeks, i. 179, 185, 186, 202, 206, 220 sq.; ii. 253.
Lope de Vega, Introd. xlii; ii.
139.
Lucan, i. 11 n., 13, 152; ii. 3 sq., 149.
Lucian, ii. 66.
Lucilius, i. 55, 163; ii. 61, 85.
Lucretius, i. 187, 200, 258; ii. 199.
- Mackenzie, Sir George, ii. 108.
Macrobius, i. 42, 91; ii. 166, 197, 204.
Maevius, ii. 164 n.
Maidwell, Mr., ii. 99.
Malherbe, ii. 217.
Manilius, ii. 214 n., 226.
Marini, ii. 225.
Martial, i. 32 n., 42 n., 103 n., 189; ii. 11 n., 24, 27, 217, 223,
224, 258 n.
Mascardi, ii. 103.
Maximus Tyrius, ii. 119.
Ménage, i. 46 n.
Merlin Coccaius, ii. 106.
Mesnardière, M. de la, his Poétique, Introd. xxxvii; on scenery, quoted, xlv.
Milbourne, ii. 266, 270.
Milton, John, the deceased author of Paradise Lost, i. 178 sqq., 268; ii. 28, 37, 109, 165, 212,
223; the poetical son of Spenser,
247.
Molière, i. 68, 88.
Montaigne, i. 193; ii. 171, 255.
Morelli, Dr., ii. 221.
Moyle, Mr. Walter, ii. 138, 184.
Mulgrave, Earl of, ii. 14; his Essay on Poetry, i. 263; ii. 162;
(Marquis of Normanby), ii. 128;
Dedication of the Æneis, 154.
- Nature, the idea of, in seventeenth-century criticism, Introd. xxiv sqq., lix sqq.; ii. 125 sqq., 257;
'the original rule,' i. 183; Aristotle and Horace, her interpreters, ibid.; ii. 156.
Normanby; see Mulgrave.
- Edipus*, by Dryden and Lee, ii.
146.
Ogilby, i. 253, 271.
- Mac Fleckno*, ii. 67.
Machines; see Heroic Poem.

- Opera, Introd. lxxv; i. 149, 270 sqq.
 Orrery, Roger Boyle, Lord, Introd. xxxi; i. 1 n.; Mustapha, 100, 209.
 Otway, Mr., ii. 145.
 Ovid, passim, i. 15, 53, 93, 222, 255; ii. 9, 109, 121, 194, 219, 246 sqq.; Epistles, i. 230 sqq.
 Owen's Epigrams, ii. 27, 224.
 Pacuvius, ii. 61.
 Paternulus, Velleius, i. 37, 42, 44, 67, 89.
 Pedro the Cruel, ii. 38 n.
 Perrault, ii. 6.
 Persius, ii. 22, 61, 69 sqq.
 Peterborough, Earl of, ii. 242.
 Petrarch, ii. 248, 255.
 Petronius, i. 33, 152, 267; ii. 3, 40, 66, 83, 151.
 Philostratus, ii. 123.
 'Pindaric' verse, Introd. lxiv; i. 77, 267.
 Plato, i. 219; Symposium, ii. 97.
 Platonic philosophy, ii. 34.
 Plautus, i. 54.
 Pliny the younger, i. 19.
 Pontanus, ii. 204.
 Porta, Baptista, ii. 262.
 Poussin, ii. 131.
Primum Mobile, i. 70 n.
 Propertius, i. 236.
 Pulci, ii. 165.
 Puns in sermons, ii. 95.
 Quarles, ii. 221.
 Quinault, i. 68.
 Quintilian, i. 164, 202; ii. 53.
 Racine, Phèdre, i. 194; Bajazet, 218; Esther, ii. 144.
 Radcliffe, Lord, ii. 1.
 Raphael, ii. 120, 199.
 Rapiu, i. 181, 190, 210, 228.
 Red Bull, Theatre, i. 58, 155.
Rehearsal, The, ii. 21.
 Revolution (1688), ii. 38, 241.
 Reynolds, Sir Joshua, on Nature, Introd. lix; his notes on Du Fresnoy, De Arte Graphica, Introd. lxviii.
 Rhyme in the Drama, i. 5, 67, 78, 90 sqq., 112 sqq., 148 sqq.
 Rigaltius, editor of Juvenal, ii. 68, &c.
 Rochester, Lord, Introd. lxx; i. 199 n.; ii. 18, 153, 225, 258.
 Romances, French, i. 55, 155, 157.
 Ronsard, on use of technical terms in poetry, Introd. xxxiii; on the Æneid, ii. 204.
 Roscommon, Earl of, i. 237, 239, 251, 257, 263; ii. 149, 222, 244.
 Ruæus, ii. 178 n., 204.
 Rymer, Mr., Introd. lxvi; i. 206 ('my friend'), 211; ii. 2 ('the corruption of a poet is the generation of a critic'), 5 n., 6 n., 28, 249 n.
 St. Evremond, on the difference between French and English, Introd. xiv; ii. 166 n., 202 n., 219 n.
 Sandys, i. 100, 230; ii. 247 ('the best versifier of the former age').
 Sarrasin, Introd. xxxv, xxxvii.
 Scaliger (the elder), i. 9, 48; ii. 3 sq., 45, 71; and passim in the Discourse on Satire, 164.
 Scaramucha, ii. 55.
 Scarron, ii. 107.
 Scudéry, M. de, Introd. xxv; preface to Alaric, quoted, liv; Alaric referred to, i. 12; ii. 28, 165.

- Scudéry, Mademoiselle de, ii. 268.
 Segrais, ii. 165 n.; Dedication of the Æneis, passim.
 Seneca, rhetorician, on Ovid, i. 93, 234.
 — his tragedies, i. 53, 105, 116.
 — the mock deification of Claudius by, ii. 67.
 Shakespeare, i. 6, 54, 79, 226;
 his faults, 165, 172, 224 sqq.; Falstaff, 84, 215; Troilus and Cressida, 203; Merry Wives, 212; Tempest, 219.
 Shrewsbury, Duke of, ii. 244.
 Sidney, Sir Philip, i. 7; 'that admirable Wit,' 173, 189; ii. 230.
 Silli, ii. 54.
 Similes out of Season, i. 223; ii. 140, 202.
 Sophocles, Œdipus, i. 213; Œdipus Coloneus, 217; Antigone, 218.
 Spanish critics, Dryden's debt to, Introd. xxxvi.
Spanish Friar, ii. 147.
 Spanish plays, i. 60, 69, 83, 208, 279.
 Spenser, i. 153, 247; ii. 28, 38, 109, 165, 173, 182, 218, 223, 229, 234, 247, 259; Shepherd's Calendar, i. 266; Mother Hubbard's Tale, ii. 67; 'wanted only to have read the rules of Bossu,' 220.
 Speroni, Sperone, i. 256.
 Stapylton, Sir Robert, Slighted Maid, i. 209; ii. 145; Juvenal, ii. 92, 112.
 Statius, i. 184, 247; ii. 26, 149.
 Stelluti, ii. 69 sqq.
 Strada, i. 246 n.
 Suckling, Sir John, i. 35, 171.
 Swan, Mr., ii. 95 n.
 Sylvester, his translation of Du Bartas, i. 189, 247.
 Tacitus, ii. 88, 258.
 Tasso, Bernardo, ii. 182.
 — Torquato, his critical opinions, Introd. xix; i. 256; ii. 194; 'the most excellent of modern poets,' i. 145, 155, 190; ii. 27, 32, 109, 178, 182, 191, 204; his Aminta, i. 265.
 Tassoni, ii. 106.
 Terence, i. 42; Eunuch, 41, 48, 49, 51, 65; Heautontimorumenos, 48; Adelphi, 50; 'all his plays have double actions,' 208.
 Theocritus, his Eidullia, i. 180, 265.
 Tragedy, i. 101; ii. 42, 157 sqq.; the Grounds of Criticism in, 207 sqq.
 Tragi-comedy, i. 57, 60; ii. 146.
 Translation, i. 237 sqq., 251 sqq.
 Trumball, Sir William, ii. 242.
 Tuke, Sir Samuel, ii. 14; The Adventures of Five Hours, i. 69, 83.
 'Turns of words and thoughts,' ii. 10, 108, 219, 257.
Tyrannic Love (St. Catherine and Maximin), ii. 126, 147.
 Unities, Dramatic, Introd. xxxix sqq.; i. 38 sqq., 57, 75, 125 sqq., 192; 'mechanic beauties of the plot,' 212; ii. 158.
 Valois, ii. 166, 201.
 Varronian (Menippean) Satire, ii. 64 sqq., 105.
 Verse, English, ii. 10, 110, 215 sqq., 259.
 Vida, ii. 43.
 Virgil, passim, i. 15, 255; ii. 36,

154 sqq. (Dedication of the Encis), 251; Vergiliomastix, 3 n.
 Vossius, Isaac, i. 280.
 • Waller, Mr., i. 7, 35, 237; ii. 14, 29, 108, 222, 247, 259.
 • Walsh, Mr., ii. 109, 244.
 Water-poet, the (Taylor), i. 104.
 Wedderburn, David, ii. 70 n.
 Wicliffe, ii. 260.
 Wild, Dr. Robert, i. 31 n.
 Wit, Dryden's account of, Introd.

lvii, lx, lxvi; i. 14, 171; 'propriety of thoughts and words,' 190, 270, 256 n.; ii. 9; pointed wit, and sentences affected out of season, i. 223; points of wit and quirks of epigram, ii. 108.
 Withers, i. 32; ii. 221.
 Wotton, Sir Henry, ii. 192.
 Wycherley, i. 182; ii. 77 n, 85, 144.
 Zimri, ii. 93.
 Zoilus, ii. 2.

THE END.